CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

SIXTIETH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

Since we are called upon so frequently to contemplate death and know that we shall before long explore the "uncharted seas" ourselves, let us contemplate it as a state less mysterious and even more natural than life. The only thing we need fear about it is that it may catch us using life unwisely—with empty hands and work all undone.

The brave man learns, as the soldier does, to put the fear of his own death behind him, and if he think of death at all it will be at such times when the scythe has cut down some loved one or some honored friend and colleague, as is the case with us this hour.

For himself there is no fear. No man can afford to waste his thoughts and time on death. The work we are put here to do demands our energies and powers. Just in proportion as we do this work faithfully will we be held in esteem by our fellows—our names recalled with pleasure and our memories revered by the generations that follow us.

In the death of CAMPBELL SLEMP, Lee County, Va., has lost an honored and useful citizen, and the Ninth Virginia District a Representative who was honored by an election for three successive terms in Congress.

He was a man of action and his life was one of achievement, as we may well infer from the period of his birth and the condition of southwest Virginia at that time. Lee County is that extreme southwest section of the Commonwealth of Virginia, running like a wedge for a number of miles between the State of Kentucky on the north and Tennessee on the south. In the youth of SLEMP no railroads penetrated the mountains of Lee County. Stock were driven through the Allegheny Mountains or up the Shenandoah Valley to Baltimore. Goods were hauled long distances to market over mountain roads. The people were poor, while great riches were hidden beneath the rugged mountains that look eternal.

These very conditions, however, helped to produce strong and practical men who developed self-reliance and determination. These characteristics were observed by those who were thrown with Colonel SLEMP. After attending the schools in Lee County he was sent to Emory and Henry College, one of the oldest institutions of learning in southwest Virginia. It is said that at Emory and Henry he was not only a diligent student, but one of the most popular. Then, no doubt, developed those traits that made him a favorite with his fellows in civil and military life and giving him at the age of 21 a captaincy in the Confederate States of America.

It is shown by the Confederate records that CAMPBELL SLEMP entered the Confederate service September 16, 1861, at Camp Lane, Lee County, Va., as captain Company A, Pound Gap Battalion, afterwards known as Company A, Twenty-first Battalion Virginia Cavalry, Confederate States army. He was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel, same battalion, date not stated, and he was reported present with the organization on April 30, 1862. On November 24, 1862, the regiment was consolidated with other Virginia troops to form the Sixty-fourth Virginia Infantry, Confederate States army, and he was appointed colonel of the new regiment, to rank from December 14, 1862.

The Union sentiment north of Lee County was strong—that in East Tennessee was still stronger—yet the people of Lee County, for the most part, were loyal to their State and the Confederacy, and furnished their full quota of men to the Southern army.

These men under SLEMP were engaged at Pound Gap and were there opposed by Colonel (afterwards General) Garfield. Later this command was sent over into Kentucky, where it took part in many skirmishes with the Union forces.

Returning to Virginia, Colonel SLEMP organized the Sixty-fourth Virginia Regiment, of which he became colonel, and with this regiment operated in Virginia, East Tennessee, and eastern Kentucky. The services of his regiment practically ended at Cumberland Gap in 1865, where General Frazier and his command was surrendered to the Union forces. The Union records of prisoners of war show that Colonel SLEMP was paroled May 2, 1865, at Cumberland Gap, Tenn.

In the death of Colonel SLEMP another of the ex-Confederates of this House has fallen on sleep. In the Fifty-fourth Congress there were thirty-two of these men here. To-day we number seven. In the Southland they are falling more rapidly than they fell in battle, and on the other side, those by whose deeds of valor we may well measure our chivalry and manhood are falling at the rate of 300 each month.

The conflict in which they engaged will soon be only a memory, while their sons will vie with each other in paying tribute to the heroism and valor of the men who wore the blue and the men who wore the gray. Monuments to each will be built on the battlefields where American valor won and lost. Faithful historians will record the facts free from the prejudices of the hour and can not fail to make mention that the one side was right under the strict construction of the Constitution and the other side right under the changed conditions of public sentiment in their respective communities. The philosophical historian of the future will not fail to record the achievements in civil life of the men who returned from the armies to their homes—often to desolate homes, where there was more than one vacant chair.

On the Southern side it required more moral courage and strength of character to meet the stern duties and pressing responsibilities of life than it did to face the mortal perils of the battlefield. Heroes they were called in war. Greater heroes were these men in peace. For their sacrifices and toils in building up their wasted fortunes; for their patience under the reconstruction laws; for their manly triumph over innumerable difficulties, due to burdensome taxation and constantly falling prices, the world will some day mete out to them full praise in story and song.

The company and regiment that Colonel SLEMP led in the engagements to which we have referred were among these men. They averaged perhaps 25 years of age when the curtain fell upon the tragic scene at Appomattox, and for the most of them at Cumberland Gap. Lee County had suffered greatly, though not so much as the counties that I have the honor to represent on this floor. These men, with their comrades, have made that county rich by their enterprise and their labors. Many of them, like Colonel SLEMP, were men of intelligence and force of character, and became, as he did, leading figures in the civil and business life of his section.

In 1878 they elected him to the house of delegates of Virginia over several competitors. In 1889 he was nominated on his ticket for lieutenant-governor and made a thorough canvass of the State. He was often selected as chairman of district and State conventions and was elector in the Harrison and McKinley campaigns.

The people of his district, who were better judges of his life and character than we, who were only thrown with him in the ordinary business of this House, bestowed on him their highest honors, and elected him over talented men like Wysor and Bruce and others.

Southwest Virginia is Republican for two reasons not well understood on this floor. The old-time Whigs inherited their opposition to Democracy. Even the most conservative of the Clay Whigs had to be graduated into the Democratic ranks through the name of "Conservative Democrats."

A great number refused to take the degree. In 1878 a third party, the Readjuster party, swept the State, producing bitterness of feeling and dividing the Democratic party. Its success was made possible through the negro vote. It soon ran its course, and when the flood subsided it left a few strong and many good men in the Republican party who had hitherto affiliated with the Democrats. Like many revolutions, it had its compensations. It taught some Democrats to conquer their prejudices, and it impressed nearly all with the stern necessity of holding to the "ancient landmarks."

The members of the grand old party of southwest Virginia can not be designated by their complexions altogether. A bright little girl of 7 years of age in my hotel from one of the Southern States, addressing a gentle and comely lady from New Jersey, said: "Are you a republic?" The lady replied: "Yes; I am what you call a republic." The child quickly replied: "Well, you are too good looking; you are the best looking republic I ever saw." Had the little child been raised within the shadow of the mountains of southwest Virginia or played along the banks of the limpid streams that flow on forever she would have met as many fair "republics" as ever watched from the Jersey coast the incoming tide from old ocean's wave.

Mr. Chairman, the laws of compensation come to most men as they journey through this bustling, active life that the pessimist describes as a "vale of tears."

Men like Colonel SLEMP, who had to be the architects of their own fortune and struggle heroically against adverse conditions, are often comforted, as he was, with children, who grew up around him with advantages and opportunities that were denied him. He looked upon these as beings of new hope and labored well to educate them. If from the spirit land we shall watch the scenes being enacted here, our deceased colleague beholds with delight and gratification his seat filled by his own son. Man lives again in those to whom he has given being. Our mistakes only furnish beacon lights to warn them of danger, while our little successes stimulate them to renewed efforts and serve as guideposts along life's journey.

In paying this tribute to the memory of my deceased colleague, I express the earnest hope that happiness and contentment may attend those who immediately bind his memory to earth.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Speaker, during the last few years of his life I was well and intimately acquainted with CAMPBELL SLEMP. During the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Congresses we boarded at the same hotel. We were about the same age. He had worn the gray while I was wearing the blue, and, like a great many other old men, we liked to get together and exchange reminiscences. We lived to some extent in the past, as is characteristic of men of our age. In that way our friendship became intimate and, like everybody else who knew him, I liked him well. His laugh was so genial, his smile was so contagious, his hearty hand grasp was so wholesome that it was a delight and joy to meet him. We never talked politics. We would most of our time talk about old times when we were boys, and we got a lot of pleasure out of it, and to-day I take a great deal of pleasure in remembering those things and the pleasure I got and the pleasure I gave to him during those conversations. When the war broke out between the two sections of the country Mr. SLEMP threw in his fortune with his State as against the great body of the nation. He fought her battles well and gallantly. He led men, as gallant soldiers as followed Alexander the Great during his career, and when the fortune of war had gone against him, when the flag he loved went down in defeat, he did not repine; he did not go whining about, complaining of his ill luck. He went to work, like thousands of other brave men who were with him, to build up the country that had been destroyed, to replace the waste places, and restore the grand old Commonwealth which he loved so well to her ancient prosperity.

I am glad he did this, not only he but thousands of others, and from that time onward he had the interest of his State as well as the interest of the United States closely at heart. There are men who will say that CAMPBELL SLEMP was wrong when he cast his fortunes with the Confederacy; there are men who will say that he was wrong when he cast his political fortunes with the party to which he had been a long time opposed. We will not discuss that. That is not for us to say, but we who know him, know that his convictions were as strong as the eternal hills among which he dwelt, and either in peace or war, in the field of battle or in the field of politics, CAMPBELL SLEMP followed his convictions, and that is enough for us to know. He had a stormy career undoubtedly. He was situated so, and his environments were such that it must have been stormy; but after life's fitful fever he sleeps well, and his death admonishes those of us who are his contemporaries, if we need any admonition, that our time is coming within the near future. We have nothing to complain about; we have done our part; we have tried to do it. I may say in passing, in speaking of his legislative career, although I was intimate with him, we did not talk very much about legislative matters, and I am inclined to think, to be fair about it, that he, like myself and a few others, entered the political arena too late in life to acquire distinction in the halls of legislation, but he did his duty. He was honest, upright, fair, always ready. No amount of trouble and no amount of worry could dim his good humor or bring a frown to his face. He has gone and they are fast going.

Those men who played an important part during those troublous days are fast passing away. We think they have done their share well, and it seems to me there is nothing grander in history than the action of the two great armies after the civil war. I speak of this to-day because he was a splendid representative of one of those armies. The Northern army—flushed with victory, some people thought they would establish a military dictatorship over this country—melted away into the ranks of peaceful life without causing a ripple. The Southern army, while they told us, and I confess I had some fears, they would start a guerrilla warfare, did nothing of the kind, but went to peaceful pursuits in life, and the country in a few years was as strong and vigorous as ever.

Gentlemen, I regard that as really greater than the battles which these men fought, the battle of self-abnegation, the battle for better things and better conditions after the bloody conflict was over.

CAMPBELL SLEMP has passed away. We, his contemporaries, will not survive him very long, but we are glad to know that the world has grown since we have been in it. It is one of those things that gives pride to a man, who has climbed to the heights of life and is going down on the other side, to know that he will leave the world a little better than he found it. I feel that, and I am optimistic about it. The men who, like CAMPBELL SLEMP, have set an example of duty to a cause, whether right or wrong, consecrated themselves and their lives to what they believed to be right, and are among the country's noblest exemplars.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Speaker—

> We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
> In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
> We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
> Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

CAMPBELL SLEMP was a Virginian by birth and life. In 1839 his eyes first saw the light. He honored the State which gave him birth, and for almost fourscore years, boy and man, he served well the "Old Dominion." I served on no committee with him here.

I knew him only since he came to Congress; and I found him genial, sociable, and reliable. Endowed by nature with a happy turn of mind, he wore the cares of public office easily and agreeably. He was always at his best in answering a political question, deciding a post-office controversy or proving to a constituent why he failed to accomplish a task. Living only a limited distance from the National Capital, and being the only Republican Member from his State, everybody from Virginia came to him for everything; and every morning from 7 o'clock to noon, at the Ebbitt House, where we both lived, and in the lobby of the House when Congress was in session, and again at the hotel up to the hour of retirement at night, the hearty laugh of Mr. SLEMP was heard. Everyone liked him, for he was everyone's friend.

In the "great unpleasantness" he, with the ardor of a local pride and the inspiration of a controlling environment, served the Confederate cause. As captain, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel he chivalrously wore the "gray" and valiantly battled for the avowed sovereignty of the Southern States. On a Confederate tombstone in Georgia there is an inscription: "To the memory of those who died for a brave and simple faith." It was in this "brave and simple faith" he believed, and for this "brave and simple faith" he fought on to the end of that incomparable struggle. But when the swift, flashing blade had declared that there was no sovereignty but the Stars and Stripes, he doffed the habiliments of rebellion and held up his hand to the Lincoln interpretation of the Constitution, Southern Democrat though he was. After that the prejudices of reconstruction did not concern him quite so much as fidelity to the Union, and with patriotic devotion he labored to rebuild the temple of absolute liberty "without the hope of fee or reward." To that purpose he brought every energy and every faculty. Not finding a ready enough acceptance of the "malice toward none, and the charity for all" of the sainted President, and differing with his party on some important public questions, he left the Democratic party in 1880, along with that splendid Virginia American, William Mahone. He soon enrolled his name among those who believe that "one man's liberty ends where another's begins." He was not one of those to commit "the unpardonable sin," and there was no unpardonable sin, in his view, in anybody else.

I like the man who is too courteous and honorable to impugn the motives of his fellows, and I always believe in his good intentions, for he is generally too worthy to have any other kind. I would that every man could shake off the sad mistakes of his life, that there might be no weight to his progress, so that he could the better run the swift race of success. I would that men could easily discriminate between the essentials and the nonessentials of life, like unto the judge on the bench, between that which is evidence and that which is not evidence.

There is more lost to life and progress and civilization and humanity through brooding over fancied wrongs, unwarranted inferences, and unprovable assumptions, than there is by panics, and wars, and hurricanes, and accidents, and disasters. Fortunate is the man who can create within himself a liberal heart, a tolerant spirit, an equity of conscience, and thereon build a character which commands unstinted acceptance and liberal respect.

There are three eternities, "faith, hope, and love." "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," and is a substantial element of human life. Hope opens the eyes wide, clasps the hands of friendship and confidently goes forth to conquer and to satisfy. Love is the charity of the human heart which binds together families, and friends, and states, and principalities, and powers. CAMPBELL SLEMP was endowed with a liberal heart, a tolerant spirit, an equity of conscience, and these three eternities possessed him body and soul, mind and strength.

He was a typical American, born of her soil, baptized in her crystal waters, nurtured in her admonitions, inspired by her possibilities. He was a true citizen of the Republic, for he believed in doing unto others as he would that others should do unto him. Indeed, this was his religion. It is a scripture impossible of misinterpretation, and worthy of universal acknowledgment.

Mr. SLEMP was a man of earnest convictions, of uncompromising conscience, of honorable impulses. He was likewise affable, courteous, and generous hearted. He lived not to himself alone, but to contribute his share of the world's work and to assume his full portion of its responsibilities. His life was respectable, creditable, and successful. He died as he lived, in the open view and critical scrutiny of the best citizenship of Virginia, and with the approving conscience of his associates in Congress. He put off not until to-morrow what he could well do to-day. He spoke the words, he did the things, he cheered the hearts, and he kept the faith of family and friends, of State and nation. His life was guided by the poet:

We shall do so much in the years to come,
But what have we done to-day?
We shall give our gold in a princely sum,
But what did we give to-day?
We shall lift the heart and dry the tear;
We shall plant a hope in the place of fear;
We shall speak the words of love and cheer,
But what did we speak to-day?

We shall be so kind in the afterwhile,
But what was the kindness to-day?
We shall bring each lonely life a smile,
But what have we brought to-day?
We shall give to truth a grander birth,
And to steadfast faith a deeper worth;
We shall feed the hungering souls of earth,
But whom have we fed to-day?

We shall reap such joys in the by-and-by,
But what have we sown to-day?
We shall build us mansions in the sky,
But what have we built to-day?
'Tis sweet in idle dreams to bask,
But here and now do we do our task?
Yes, this is the thing our souls must ask:
What have we done to-day?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as some of those who had indicated a desire to speak on this occasion are unavoidably absent, I ask unanimous consent that they may be permitted to print their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Boston, Mass., which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Boston, Mass., March 6, 1908.

Report of the committee on banking and resolutions unanimously adopted at a meeting of the Boston Chamber of Commerce held March 6, 1908.

Your committee on banking desires to present for consideration by the members of the chamber of commerce and to recommend the passage of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the Boston Chamber of Commerce is opposed to the passage of Senate bill 3023 for the amendment of the national banking laws, known as the 'Aldrich bill.'

"(1) It is makeshift legislation which tends to perpetuate another piece of makeshift legislation originally adopted as a war measure and which had chiefly for its object the creation of an artificial demand for Government bonds rather than a scientific, elastic currency.

"(2) It provides for the subtraction of $500,000,000 of mercantile balances from active trade.

"(3) It contemplates the investment of $500,000,000 of deposits payable on demand in long-time obligations instead of in short-time and constantly maturing obligations which constitute the proper and customary method of employing bank deposits.

"The acute strain on our national banks of the recent panic is now over, the country is not under the stress of war, and the Boston Chamber of Commerce believes that now is the proper time to set the house in order by a comprehensive, constructive, and scientific piece of currency legislation, and we have confidence that the intelligence and patriotism of Congress can give us a currency system which will equal in merit the best system in vogue in any other country."

The contemplated legislation should embody the following features:

"(1) An elastic currency which shall expand and contract not merely under the crux of a great commercial crisis, but shall be sensitive to the seasonable and other minor fluctuations of trade.

"(2) The currency should be guaranteed by the Government.

"(3) The Government should be amply protected in its guaranty by such tax as shall serve to fully cover any possible loss under the guaranty.

"(4) The currency should not be marked or labeled in any way as emergency circulation, but should consist of a fluctuation in amount of the currency normally in use.

"(5) If the currency is to be secured by this special pledge of collateral, the banks should be permitted to deposit with the Government clearing-house certificates, secured in turn by the deposit with the local clearing house of short-time mercantile paper."

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Epping, N. H., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MATERIAL FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. FRYE. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, I ask that the joint resolution (S. R. 40) to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal be now considered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 2, line 4, to strike out the words "passengers, mails, and for other purposes" and insert in lieu thereof "employees on, and mails for said canal," so as to make the additional proviso read:

And provided further, That the Isthmian Canal Commission is hereby authorized to purchase and operate vessels of the United States for the transportation of material and equipment for the use of the canal, employees on, and mails for said canal, whenever in the opinion of the President the public interests will be best so served.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. On page 1, line 7, after the word "Company," I move to insert "or to vessels of the United States chartered by the United States or by the Panama Railroad Company," so as to read:

That in any contract hereafter made transportation by sea of material and equipment from the United States for use in the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to vessels owned by the United States or by the Panama Railroad Company, or to vessels of the United States chartered by the United States or by the Panama Railroad Company, or to vessels of the United States tendered by the lowest responsible bidder, unless the President shall in any case deem the bids or tenders therefor to be extortionate or unreasonable.

Mr. FRYE. On page 1 I move to strike out in lines 11 and 12 the following words:

The British steamship Dunottar Castle until the expiration of its present charter to the Panama Railroad Company—and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Any foreign steamship chartered by the Panama Railroad Company to take the place of any of the present fleet destroyed or undergoing repairs after the President shall have been satisfied a suitable vessel of the United States could not have been chartered on reasonable terms for that purpose.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That this resolution shall not apply to any foreign steamship chartered by the Panama Railroad Company to take the place of any of the present fleet destroyed or undergoing repairs after the President shall have been satisfied a suitable vessel of the United States could not have been chartered on reasonable terms for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. On page 2, line 2, after the word "purchase," I move to insert "charter," so as to read:

That the Isthmian Canal Commission is hereby authorized to purchase, charter, and operate vessels of the United States, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], I understand, desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. At the end of the joint resolution I offer the following amendment in the shape of a proviso.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the joint resolution add the following proviso:

Provided, That this resolution shall not apply to the Gulf ports, nor to any port of the United States from which such vessels of the United States can not be secured for the trade.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] stated that he would like to amend the joint resolution so as to include South Atlantic ports, but he is not in the Chamber.

Mr. FRYE. This practically covers everything south. It practically does, because we have not a steamship down there.

Mr. FOSTER. I think so.

Mr. FRYE. And we shall not have one down there at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the report in this case may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report, submitted by Mr. FRYE, February 6, 1908, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 40) to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass with an amendment, as follows:

"Page 2, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words 'passengers, mails, and for other purposes' and insert in lieu thereof the following: 'employees on, and mails for said canal.'"

The Isthmian Canal Commission on January 28 issued proposals for furnishing 4,500,000 barrels, or about 1,000,000 tons, of cement, bids to be opened on March 12 next. The specification calls for proposals on the basis of transporting the cement in American or foreign bottoms. The cement may be delivered at seaports of the United States, or at Colon or La Boca, on the Isthmus.

This cement is to be delivered at about the rate of 30,000 tons a month, so that the contracts will cover the transportation of cement for the next three years. It is one of the most important canal contracts.

I. Under date of May 14, 1906 (H. Rept. 4878, 59th Cong., 1st sess.), the Secretary of War wrote to the President:

"The result of a consideration of general principles of law and the practice of the Government, in the absence of specific direction to the contrary, is that, in the construction of the Panama Canal in the Canal Zone on the Isthmus, which is outside the tariff wall surrounding the United States proper, and into which, by virtue of the Hay-Varilla treaty with the Republic of Panama, material, supplies, and machinery of all kinds for the construction of the canal are to be introduced free from tariff or imposts, it is your duty to buy where you can obtain the material, supplies, and machinery at the cheapest price, other conditions with respect to quality, prompt delivery, etc., being equal. This view, it seems to me, is confirmed by the failure of Congress to direct any different course on your part, although the matter was brought to its attention more than a year ago, and your view of your duty in the premises, if Congress took no further action, was clearly indicated.

"I ought to add that, while of course a very large proportion of all the purchases made for the construction of the canal have been from American merchants and manufacturers, some purchases have already been made abroad, and a saving effected in the purchase of comparatively small quantities of cement. In the construction of the canal an enormous quantity of cement will have to be purchased, and the question will soon recur again as to the acceptance of foreign bids for this material."

Congress thereupon passed the following joint resolution, approved June 25, 1906:

"Resolved, etc., That purchases of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to articles of domestic production and manufacture, from the lowest responsible bidder, unless the President shall, in any case, deem the bids or tenders therefor to be extortionate or unreasonable."

Under this joint resolution the Canal Commission is required to purchase American cement "unless the President shall, in any case, deem the bids or tenders therefor to be extortionate or unreasonable."

II. So far as the transportation is concerned the Secretary of War holds, as he did in the case of materials, that the Commission must accept the lowest responsible bidder in the failure of Congress to direct differently. Unquestionably the bids of foreign shipowners will be lower than the bids of American shipowners for well-understood reasons. If Congress shall take no action, the Canal Commission will in effect be compelled to employ foreign ships entirely in contracts covering the transportation of 1,000,000 tons of cement and lasting for three years, whatever may be the desire of the Administration, of Congress, and of the American people. The joint resolution does not require the use of American ships. It serves two purposes:

(a) It prevents the obligatory use of foreign ships in the completion of the canal at the expense of the American people—a canal which itself to a very great extent will be a benefit to foreign shipping.

(b) It gives American ships a chance to do some part of this work, provided American transportation bids are not "extortionate or unreasonable."

III. The failure of Congress to take any action will put a two-edged sword against American maritime interests into the hands of foreign shipowners. It will not only confirm them in the monopoly of carrying materials and supplies for the American Government to the Isthmus, but will also give them exceptional advantages in trade between the ports of the Caribbean, Gulf of Mexico, and American ports. Assured of American contracts for cargoes outward to the Isthmus for a period of three years, foreign shipowners will be in an exceptionally advantageous position to make contracts for return cargoes of ore, sugar, and other bulk products of the West Indies and of the countries of Central and South America adjacent to the Caribbean and Gulf of Mexico. The hold of American shipping on the Caribbean and Gulf trade has been greatly lessened of late years, and it may well despair for the future if the Government shall now still further lessen its opportunities for profitable employment in this branch of trade. It has been the hope of some that one result of the construction of the Panama Canal would be to make the Caribbean and Gulf an American lake and assure to the American merchant marine a return of its prominence in these waters. Yet the proposition which will be forced upon the United States by the failure of Congress to act at this time will at the outset stand in the way of the fulfillment of such a hope.

IV. (a) Some time ago the Panama Railroad Company felt itself obliged to charter a British passenger steamer, the Dunottar Castle, to supply the place of an American steamer, the Alliança, undergoing extensive repairs. The Dunottar Castle belongs to the Union Castle Mail Line, which for years has received a subsidy of $656,000 for transporting the British mails between England and Cape Colony. The Dunottar Castle was built in 1890, and stands tenth on the list of the ships of the Castle Line—no longer available to meet the requirements of the British mail service. She was last known to the world as the troop ship which carried Lord Roberts and his staff to the Boer war. Having drawn subsidies as a part of the imperial mail system for years, and having served as part of the British military system, now, when 17 years old, the Dunottar Castle turns for its dividends to the American Government.

These considerations are not submitted in criticism of the Canal Commission. It has no power to weigh them, when known to it. Its work is doubtless being done to the best of excellent ability generally conceded.

The question of transportation of cement is an imminent one—to be settled possibly within a few days. It is more than a question of "cheapness."

Mr. FRYE. Colonel Goethals in a letter addressed to the Secretary of War states that during the next year there will be freighted to Panama: Coal, 400,000 to 500,000 tons; cement, 300,000 to 400,000 tons; lumber, ties, and piles, 150,000 to 250,000 tons; mails, cars, miscellaneous cargo, 100,000 to 150,000 tons; total, 950,000 to 1,300,000 tons a year. One million tons of cement are to be transported to the Isthmus at the rate of 30,000 tons a month, and it will take three years for the transportation of the cement.

Under the law the Secretary of War holds that he must take the lowest bid for this transportation. That means that not one ounce of this freight will be carried by an American ship under the American flag, and that foreign ships, principally British, foreign officers and foreign sailors, will receive the entire freight money.

Colonel Goethals, a most admirable and efficient Army engineer, and the right man, in my judgment, in his present position, has but one purpose, and that is the earliest possible completion of the canal at the lowest possible cost. He has no sentiment as to how this freight shall be carried, no care whether it is under the American flag or a British flag, whether the enormous freight money is to be paid to foreigners or Americans.

In a letter to the Secretary of War he expressed a serious doubt as to whether there were American ships sufficient to do this freighting, and if there were not, that it would cause delay, to which he seriously objects.

I have a list of American ships ready to-day to make bids for this business. There are some forty of them, and they are sufficient in number and in tonnage to carry five times or ten times more freight than that which Colonel Goethals calls to the attention of the country.

The colonel knows not much about ships. In his letter he found that a 2,000-ton ship net would carry 2,000 tons of coal or cement and that a 5,000-ton ship would carry 5,000 tons of coal or cement. As a matter of fact, a 2,000-ton ship net will carry 4,000 tons of coal or cement and a 5,000-ton ship net will carry 10,000 tons of coal or cement.

The colonel further suggested that contractors could not be found who would bid to deliver at Panama this freight in American vessels. But, like the honorable gentleman he is, he wrote a letter to the Secretary of War in which he said he was entirely mistaken in that; that he has had communications from contractors stating that they will be ready to bid at any time to deliver at Panama. The colonel also in a letter sent a list of five or six more ships than were included in my list. I desire to have read this letter from the Atlantic Carriers Association.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTIC CARRIERS' ASSOCIATION,
130 AND 132 PEARL STREET,
New York, February 15, 1908.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We are greatly interested in Senate resolution No. 40, introduced by you January 27, 1908, and write to express the earnest hope that it will receive prompt consideration.

At the present time there are more than 200 vessels in the port of New York, more than 100 of them are idle and waiting for a charter, from which the owners can pay their operating expenses. This is equally true of Norfolk, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, and other Atlantic ports.

There has not been a time for the past twenty years when so much American tonnage was idle. At the present time I do not hesitate to say that there are at least 200 American sailing vessels that would be desirous of chartering on this business. Should your committee or Senate desire the names I will submit a list of them. All are available. To express the deplorable state of the freight market I have only to inform you that we are chartering vessels from Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Norfolk to Galveston, Tex., on coal at 88 cents net per gross ton, less than 4 cents per 100 pounds, and out of that we must pay excessive pilotage charges, together with all the operating expenses and fixed charges.

The streets of New York are thronged with American sailors looking for employment, and many are actually starving for want of a position.

We realize that you will have, as is always the case in this kind of legislation, the foreign steamship opposition, but it seems that Congress at least should grant the shipowner and American shipmaster and crews an opportunity to transport the materials that they in turn help pay for. We know of several reputable concerns that would be glad to carry this entire contract in American vessels.

I have the honor to remain, with best wishes for the success of the resolution,

Yours, respectfully,

ATLANTIC CARRIERS' ASSOCIATION,
By FIELDS S. PENDLETON, President.

Representing 400,000 tons of American-built and American-owned sailing vessels.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I caught it rightly, this letter writer states that he is now transporting coal at 4 cents a hundred from New York to Galveston, or Boston to Galveston, somewhere around there. I should like to have the Senator tell us whether the Canal Commission have any bids for the transportation of cement? In other words, can we get it at the prices which the Government is now paying, or will be compelled to pay, if the joint resolution goes through?

Mr. FRYE. No; there are no bids, because there was not any chance whatever for an American ship to make a bid and have it accepted. When the foreign ship costs 33⅓ per cent less than the American, the officers and crew 33⅓ per cent less, it was no use for an American ship to undertake to compete with a British ship. But if the joint resolution becomes a law there will be bids, and they will be surprisingly low.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I understand it, then, the Senator desires to compel us to employ our own ships, regardless of expense?

Mr. FRYE. I do; and I say it is a shame, it is a disgrace to the United States of America, rich and powerful as it is, to have sailors starving in New York City when we are providing money for the support of British sailors.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FRYE. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he is asking present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. FRYE. It is before the Senate by unanimous consent.

Mr. FULTON. I did not understand the status of it. My attention was called to it only since the Senator took the floor.

If the Senator will permit me, I wish to state that while I am, I believe, as earnestly in favor of developing the building up of the American merchant marine as any advocate of that policy possibly can be, yet I must have also in mind the conditions in various sections of our country, and particularly that section from which I come. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that very unfortunately we have no American vessels——

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. He did not hear an amendment which has been agreed to already by the Senate, which provides against just that.

Mr. FULTON. I would be glad to have it read.

Mr. FRYE. It is an amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] and accepted by me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the joint resolution add the following proviso:

Provided, That this resolution shall not apply to Gulf ports nor to any port of the United States from which such vessels of the United States can not be secured for the trade.

Mr. FULTON. Without intruding on the Senator's time, I will suggest in response to that, it seems to me it should go a little further, and there should be some restriction on the power of the Commission or the President to reject foreign vessels. There should be some restriction in regard to the difference in price. It is possible of course that we could get an American vessel in New York harbor to agree to go around to the Columbia River and take a cargo of lumber down to Panama.

Mr. FRYE. There is no probability of it.

Mr. FULTON. If we would pay them enough probably they would do it, but there is no probability of it. I suggest to the Senator that there should be some provision in the joint resolution that would give the American ships the preference and yet would protect the shippers against unreasonable charges and unreasonable rulings. That which would be extortionate or unreasonable in the view of the Commission might not strike the bidders in the same way. Indeed, the shippers might feel that, in their judgment, from their standpoint, it was unreasonable and it might not be deemed unreasonable by the Commission. I think there ought to be more restrictions thrown around the power of the Commission to prefer an American vessel than there is.

Mr. FRYE. The Commission has no power about it. The President of the United States is to say whether it is reasonable or not.

Mr. FULTON. The President of the United States, but in the ultimate, final analysis it will be done by the Commission, because the President can not possibly give his individual attention to all these matters.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Only for a question. What would be the form of provision that the Senator suggests?

Mr. FULTON. Speaking offhand, I would be willing to allow the American vessel a certain percentage of difference in charge. I am not prepared to say just now, because what the percentage of difference should be is a matter which the committee should inquire into carefully. I would always prefer the American vessel, but at the same time we must consider the American producers as well. I am very much afraid if the joint resolution, even with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana, shall be passed it will absolutely prevent the shipping of lumber supplies from the Northwest to Panama.

I do not wish to take up the time of the Senator from Maine, and I apologize for having done so to the extent I have, but I hope this matter will not be pushed at the present time, for I should like to inquire into it a little more.

Mr. FRYE. It must be pushed at the present time. These bids are to be opened in April.

Mr. FULTON. Very well then, Mr. President, I shall have to oppose the joint resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Maine a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. Has the Senator any information as to whether or not the Commission has ever considered the feasibility and cost of manufacturing its own cement on the ground?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. I have the papers in my room, but I think I can state from memory in regard to it. If the cement is taken down there in crude form and ground and manufactured on the spot, it will be necessary to build a mill for the purpose. Investigation has shown that the construction of the mill would cost in the neighborhood of $1,000,000, and it would take something like a year to build it and equip it with the machinery. I think there is no question in the minds of the engineers and those charged with the construction of the canal that it is altogether the cheapest and the best way to take the cement down in barrels.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is there any report to that effect?

Mr. LODGE. Why should there be a report?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is making a statement. What does he base his assertion on?

Mr. LODGE. I base it on the statement of the engineer of the Commission.

Mr. TILLMAN. On a statement made to him personally?

Mr. LODGE. On a statement made to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. Given to you personally?

Mr. LODGE. Given to me personally.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then if the Senator vouches for it, that is a different proposition, but to get up and give us hearsay does not go here; at least nobody takes my hearsay.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. I simply want to state in answer to the question of the Senator from South Carolina, that there has been a full and complete investigation as to the manufacture of cement on the Isthmus. The report has been made by the officials of the Geological Survey, who have investigated not only as to the cost of the cement, but the possibility of making the quantity of cement and the time that would be necessary to build a plant. They have the material there in proper quantity, and with a plant they would make good material. The only question is as to whether or not the cement can be purchased in the United States and shipped to the canal cheaper than it can be manufactured at the Isthmus, including the cost of the plant, which would be useless after the canal had been constructed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would we not have to keep the canal in repair?

Mr. FLINT. It would not require such an enormous plant as would be required if we made a large amount of cement during the construction of the canal.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will kindly furnish us the report to which he has referred, or tell us where we can get it, so that we may have it in print and read it, we shall have a better understanding of the situation.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator can obtain it very easily by applying to the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from California can obtain it easier, because I do not know where it is.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator can obtain it by writing to the Isthmian Canal Commission and asking for a copy of the report. They have it there.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have the Senator from California send me over a brief outline of it. If I am correct in my information, the construction of such a mill for grinding cement would take a long time and cost a very large amount of money.

Mr. FLINT. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. It involves a great deal of machinery, and, I understand from those in charge of the work, to take the cement down in barrels is altogether the cheapest way.

Mr. FLINT. They want to be in a position, if an exorbitant price is charged, that they can make cement on the Isthmus. They are holding that merely as a precautionary matter, so that exorbitant charges can not be made in the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Possibly; but as to the cement now there which has been ordered by the War Department, I have not heard it suggested that the price of that was exorbitant.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from South Carolina will look at the last report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, he will find that the Commission report as to the cost of cement after they have built this plant. That does not enter into the cost. After the plant is built, the cost will be, as I recollect, about $1.34 a barrel. Cement ought to be delivered from the United States for less than that. I think it is hardly the proper thing for the United States to go into the cement business as a business. It seems to me the proper method is to buy cement in the United States where it can be bought the cheapest. There is another thing to be considered in buying cement. It would hardly pay to buy some kinds of cement for this class of work. The cement to be used there should be the best cement that can be made, and, even then, it will be very difficult to construct the locks on that canal so that they will not be liable to break and to become useless.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maine will permit me further——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FRYE. I do.

Mr. FLINT. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the place in the annual report of the Isthmian Canal Commission where he can find the information he desires. It is in the report of 1907, from page 125 to page 129.

Mr. TILLMAN. Turn the pages down, please, and I will get the volume later.

Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] told us that he thought this cement ought to be bought in the United States. My understanding is that the Canal Zone is a part of the United States. It is under our flag, and we are spending an immense amount of money there. Practically it is a part and parcel of the United States. But whether it be or not, the one, two, three, four, five, or any other number of hundreds of millions of dollars that the canal is to cost is to be paid for by the people of the United States, and in the present nebulous situation as to the probable cost of this great work I think it behooves us to look a little carefully into the sources of expenditure and the amount of money to be spent there. While I agree with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and am in a way a believer in the doctrine of "America for Americans," and want to see to it that our own people get the benefit of our own taxes, as they are the people who pay the cost of the canal, I think we ought to balance things a little, and not just rush headlong pellmell into expenditures for a favored class, without considering those who are to pay for this great work.

My reason for inquiring as to the possibility of manufacturing cement at Panama is the certainty that he shall have to use an immense quantity of it there. I have not read the report and do not know how much, and perhaps some of those who are on the Interoceanic Canal Committee can enlighten me. I think we have some Democrats on that committee. I do not even know who they are. What do they know about this? What are they on the committee for?

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. I think if the Senator from South Carolina were on the committee, he would find that the Democratic members are very much interested in it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not charging anybody with not being interested in it. I am not accusing anyone; I am not criticising anyone; but I call attention to the fact that we should like to have some light.

Mr. STONE. I am not on that committee, Mr. President, but I can say now, as stated in the report accompanying the joint resolution that is now being considered, the statement is that the Isthmian Canal Commission on January 28 issued proposals for furnishing 4,500,000 barrels, or about 1,000,000 tons, of cement.

Mr. FLINT. Is that all we are going to need?

Mr. STONE. I do not know.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I should like the Chair to inform us who has the floor. We can not tell.

Mr. FRYE. In imagination the Senator from Maine has, but only in imagination.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Answering the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], the Chair will say that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] yielded, as the Chair understood, to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and the Senator from South Carolina has the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course I yield to the Senator from Maine, who may come in whenever he sees fit to take me off the floor; but as he has always been courteous, I know he does not object to having the fullest possible light thrown on this or any other subject with which he is associated.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to this point——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply desire to remind the Senator from South Carolina that this joint resolution comes from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TILLMAN. But incidentally it brings in the subject of the interoceanic canal and the transportation of cement for building it.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] brought that question in.

Mr. TILLMAN. No, indeed; the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] brought it in.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood the Senator from South Carolina to make an inquiry of the Senator from Maine as to the transportation of cement.

Mr. TILLMAN. The avowed purpose of this joint resolution, as I understand it, is to provide a means of transporting this cement to the Isthmus in American bottoms.

Mr. CULBERSON. But my only purpose in rising, Mr. President, was to state to the Senator from South Carolina, in view of what he has said, that he would like to know the opinion of Democrats on the Committee on Interoceanic Canals with reference to this——

Mr. TILLMAN. Well?

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], one of whom is on the Committee on Commerce, have prepared and presented a resolution——

Mr. TILLMAN. An amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. An amendment, which is in a sense protective of the interests of the country——

Mr. TILLMAN. Of the South.

Mr. CULBERSON. Against a monopoly that is about to be created in other parts of the United States. Those are the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who have been looking after this matter, and several others have incidentally given the matter some attention. We understand the Senator from Maine has accepted the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana. In the meanwhile the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] presents what I agree is a strong point against the joint resolution, and which, if he had not presented it, would have been presented by some one on this side—that is, that the people of the United States are still not protected against the extortionate charges of the monopoly which may be thus created, because it is only left to the President to refuse these contracts when the rates are extortionate, but not when they are high or unreasonable.

Mr. FRYE. The language is, "when they are unreasonable."

Mr. FULTON. The language is "extortionate or unreasonable." The use of the word "extortionate" in connection with the word "unreasonable" I think qualifies "unreasonable" very much.

Mr. FRYE. I am willing to strike out "extortionate."

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will pardon me, I will ask him in this connection if he will agree to an amendment, which I will state? If he will, so far as I am concerned it will prevent me from offering any opposition to the joint resolution. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] has proposed this amendment, which has been accepted:

Provided, That this resolution shall not apply to the Gulf nor to any port of the United States in which such vessels of the United States can not be secured for the trade.

Will the Senator from Maine consent that after the word "Gulf" shall be inserted the words "nor to ports on the coast of the State of Oregon?"

Mr. BACON. I want to say, Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say that I had already stated to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] that I proposed to offer an amendment after the word "Gulf," to insert the words "or South Atlantic;" so that it would read "Gulf or South Atlantic ports."

I am perfectly willing that no port shall be mentioned, and that the general term "ports" shall be included; but if any ports are to be mentioned, then, I presume, those of us who represent different parts of the coast in the East and West will desire that there shall be specific mention of those specific ports. I myself shall ask that the words "or South Atlantic" be inserted after the word "Gulf."

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator to withhold his request until I get mine in.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will permit, I should like to have the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] explain why Oregon should be favored to the exclusion of California or Florida or South Carolina?

Mr. FULTON. That is very easily answered. Oregon is a far better country. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. That may be, but it depends on who says it is a better country. [Laughter.]

Mr. FULTON. However, Mr. President, in all seriousness, I will say the reason is because there are no American vessels there to accommodate the trade. Just a few days ago—I think not over ten days ago—I received a wire from people on the Columbia River who desired to bid to furnish lumber for Panama, asking whether or not they could employ a foreign vessel to ship it, and saying that if they could not, it would be impossible for them to bid. They were advised, of course, that they could, and no doubt they acted on that advice.

Mr. FRYE. The joint resolution provides now that where there are no American steamships its provisions shall not apply.

Mr. FULTON. That depends upon the construction placed upon the language.

Mr. FRYE. I do not see how it can be construed in any other way than that.

Mr. FULTON. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana reads:

In which such vessels of the United States can not be secured for the trade.

What is the meaning of the language "can not be secured for the trade?" Perhaps if we could get vessels to come up there from some other port down the coast you would say that they could be secured for the trade.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator honestly think that a sailing ship would go around the Horn and up to the Columbia River to load with lumber to bring it down to Panama? Does he really think so?

Mr. FULTON. I hope that if the Senator thinks I think at all, he thinks I think honestly.

Mr. FRYE. Then do you think at all? [Laughter.]

Mr. FULTON. Of course in discussing this question I would hate to leave that proposition to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. You would be perfectly safe.

Mr. FULTON. Well, I am not certain about that.

Mr. FRYE. Oh, the Senator would.

Mr. FULTON. I am very certain of this, Mr. President, that there might be a construction of this language different from that the Senator suggests. I take it some people—for instance, the Senator from Maine—might think if a merchant on the Columbia River could get American vessels in San Francisco to come up to the Columbia River and take a cargo, that he was in duty bound to do it, even though he had to pay an added freight charge to secure them. I am not certain what added freight charge would be deemed reasonable under this bill, but I do know that it would seriously handicap a section of the country where there are no American vessels as compared with a section where there are some, because the farther the vessel has to go to secure the trade the greater the charge is going to be. Therefore, Mr. President, as I view it at the present time, unless the Senator can accept the amendment I suggest I can not see my way clear to support this joint resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, if the Senator from Maine will permit me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am told by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who has examined the report, that under the plans and specifications as now drawn by the engineers we will require for the Panama Canal 5,000,000 barrels of cement. Is it 5,000,000 barrels or 5,000,000 tons?

Mr. FLINT. It is estimated that there will be 5,000,000 barrels of cement required for this work.

Mr, TILLMAN. Mr. President, when I call attention to the fact——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Maine has the floor.

Mr. FRYE. He thought he had, but he has not. [Laughter.]

Mr. TELLER. I think this discussion has demonstrated what I have complained of for some time, namely, that nobody has actually given any attention to this great enterprise down there that is going to cost so much money. No one seems to know how much cement will be required, and I do not believe anybody can tell from the report. It is said that they want 5,000,000 barrels. I do not know how much more they may want. I believe it is stated in the report of the Commission that they have the material for making cement. I have gone over that report very carefully, and I do not believe from an examination of the matter that anybody can say with any certainty that there is any real good cement material down there. So nobody can say whether it is in quantity sufficient to justify the Government of the United States in going to work on it.

I have not the slightest doubt, Mr. President, that when they get to work they will want twice the amount of cement they talk about using now, just as the construction of the canal will cost twice as much money as they are talking about using now.

As I understand this proposition, it is to buy a certain amount of cement now and have it on hand. I myself do not think there is any hurry about it. I want to say that I have gone over the report with as much care as I think a man who is not on the committee can, or ought to do, who is not charged with any special duty in connection with it, and I have not any hesitation in saying that it will be two years before they are ready to use a pound of cement. There is no reason to suppose they want to use any cement now at all, unless for some temporary purpose. They are certainly not in condition to commence the construction of any locks or any dams, and will not be for a long time to come. I do not think there is any special haste about this matter.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the view of those charged with the work is that they will need this cement by December next, and that they ought to begin to ship it as soon as possible. They have called for bids for the whole amount, and I understand the bids have been sent to the Department. Those are the views of the people who do know about it.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will permit me a moment, in the report filed by the Senator from Maine with this joint resolution I find this statement:

The Isthmian Canal Commission, on January 28, issued proposals for furnishing 4,500,000 barrels, or about 1,000,000 tons of cement, bids to be opened on March 12 next.

Mr. LODGE. I understand bids from various cement manufacturers and producers are now in the Department.

Mr. STONE. But there are other things to be carried.

Mr. LODGE. And the cement will be needed there by December.

Mr. STONE. But cement is not the only thing to be transported.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. FRYE. The time for opening bids has been deferred, I think, to April 23, in order to learn what Congress proposes to do.

Mr. TELLER. That is, as I understand, bids for the cement, and not bids for transportation.

Mr. FRYE. Yes; for transportation.

Mr. TELLER. Both transportation and cement?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, of course what I have said about the time when they will begin to use the cement may be taken with some qualifications from the fact that I have never believed—and I think I am justified in that opinion—I have never believed that they would make the progress on the Isthmian Canal that it is claimed they will make. I am justified in doubting, Mr. President, because a careful examination will show that the Commission has never come up to the promises they have made.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to know whether the Senator from Maine occupies the floor or whether I do, because, although I have been trying to say something here for half an hour, I have been interrupted so often that just about the time I get ready to say it, somebody jumps in.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from South Carolina seems to have occupied it a good deal more than the Senator from Maine has.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well, let the Senator from Maine get through, and I will occupy the floor after he finishes.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to have printed the statement which I send to the desk concerning the number of ships that can be employed in this business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

AMERICAN STEAMERS AVAILABLE.

4. Following is a partial list of American steamers available for this transportation:

(Each net register ton of 100 cubic feet will hold from 2 to 2¼ tons of cement, coal, or similar heavy bulk cargo.)

	Net register tons.
Boston Steamship Company.
1. Shawmut	6,195
2. Tremont	6,195
Total	12,390
Brunswick (Ga.) Steamship Company.
3. Altamaha	2,046
4. Ocmulgee	2,042
5. Ogeechee	2,039
6. Ossabaw	2,043
7. Satilla	2,044
Total	10,214
Boston Towboat Company.
8. Lyra	3,516
9. Hyades	2,932
10. Pleiades	2,932

	Net register tons.
Massachusetts Steamship Company.
11. Everett	3,301
12. Malden	3,301
13. Melrose	3,301
Luckenbachs.
14. J. L. Luckenbach	3,192
15. Lewis Luckenbach	2,574
16. Brooklyn	2,276
17. Julia Luckenbach	1,977
18. Harry Luckenbach	1,799

Name.	Net tons.	Name.	Net tons.
Shawmut	6,195	Everett	3,301
Tremont	6,195	Malden	3,301
Hyades	2,932	Melrose	3,301
Pleiades	2,932	Lyra	3,516

Following are freight steamers which, I think, would be available from time to time:

Name.	Net tons.	Name.	Net tons.
Brooklyn	2,276	Evelyn	1,185
Joseph W. Fordney	2,297	Wilhelmina	1,038
Lewis Luckenbach	2,574	Missouri	5,077
Julia Luckenbach	1,977	Massachusetts	5,131
J. L. Luckenbach	3,192	Harry Luckenbach	1,799
Lassele	1,225	West Point	1,168

Mae, 1,281 net (3,000 tons cargo); Carolyn, 1,414 net (3,350 tons cargo); Dorothy, 1,629 net (3,400 tons cargo).

The Luckenbach Company stated that their steamers, Jacob Luckenbach, 1,744 net registered tons, and Marie, 1,615 net registered tons, were also available, and from James W. Elwell & Co., of New York, that they had available the American steamers Hector, 1,851 net registered tons, and Lassell, 1,225 net registered tons. These four steamers, aggregating 6,435 net tons, can carry over 12,000 tons of cargo on one voyage each, or during a year, upward of 100,000 tons of cargo.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. Under this extraordinary method of discussion I will yield the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine yields the floor.

Mr. FRYE. But before doing so I will simply say that I desire to have a vote on the joint resolution this morning, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has notified the Senate that he desires to speak at 2 o'clock on the financial bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine yields to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, now, do I occupy the floor by sufferance of the Senator from Maine or do I occupy it in my own right? Will the President please tell me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized in his own right.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now I can understand the status. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, when I called attention to the possibility and feasibility and probable cost of manufacturing cement on the Isthmus itself, I had no conception or dream that I would bring up any such confused and tangled debate as has caused the Senator from Maine to reprimand me in a way.

Mr. FRYE. Oh, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I would not reprimand him under any conditions. I have the greatest admiration for the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. But we very often reprimand even those we love. [Laughter.]

I had in mind, Mr. President, the fact that the ultimate cost of the transportation, as well as of the cement, would come out of the taxpayers of the United States, and I can not see any good reason why we should, in our anxiety to aid the shipowners, forget the men who are to pay the taxes. If the cement can be manufactured on the Isthmus at a less cost than it can be bought in the United States and transported there, the labor being paid for by this Government, and also the materials and machinery that may be required, I, for one, believe it ought to be done.

I have in mind, Mr. President, a case nearer home, where this Government has entered into the manufacture of cement for its own use. We have on foot in Arizona a great irrigation project, a reclamation project, and it was my good fortune as well as my pleasure last June to visit what is known as the "Roosevelt dam site," in the Salt River Valley, some 80 miles above Phoenix. It is proposed there to build the highest dam that has ever been constructed in the world and to create a storage reservoir covering, I think, some 13,000 acres, simply to hold in reserve the water which falls in the shape of snow or rain and has been running off, to be let out when needed to supply a sufficient volume to cover an irrigable area lower down the stream.

One of the first things which I saw when I reached Roosevelt was a very large and apparently magnificently equipped cement mill; and they were digging in the side of the mountain to get limestone and clay, both right on the spot, for material with which to make cement. I had passed in transit going from Phoenix to Roosevelt a good number of oil wagons, wagons with tanks on wheels, carrying petroleum for fuel in the manufacture of cement. I was told by the engineers in charge that in making the estimate for the cost of this dam the bids for cement were so enormously high, because the cement manufacturers of the country who might want to supply the Government would have to transport it by rail to Phoenix and then haul it by wagon this 80 miles, that the Government decided that it could manufacture its cement on the spot and carry the fuel to Roosevelt at a cheaper rate than it could buy it for. The result was, as I have said, that we have a very large cement plant there, and the price of cement manufactured by the Government in that way is very much less than what it would have to pay to have the cement supplied by contract at a place even 10 miles from Phoenix, where they are building an outlet dam, or a check dam, to let the water get out of the river bed onto the irrigable land. In fact, they are now hauling cement from the Roosevelt dam site, 70 miles back toward Phoenix, 10 miles from a railroad station, and are saving money by it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I will simply add that at the time it was projected that the Government should commence these cement works, there was a protest throughout the United States on the part of the cement manufacturers of the so-called "cement trust" against this as a perversion of governmental functions; but, notwithstanding that, the Government persevered and adhered to its purpose, and has thereby accomplished an enormous saving in these works.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is what I have said—that we will save several hundred thousand dollars, perhaps millions of dollars, in constructing the Isthmian Canal if we manufacture our own cement.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I will add that one of the reasons why the Reclamation Service has been so successful in inaugurating and pushing and putting through these twenty-three projects of enormous proportions in various States of the Union is that they have had a comparatively free hand in all business propositions relating to construction.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator for the additional light on this subject of governmental manufacture. We have had to go into the manufacture of powder to save ourselves from the powder trust. We have got what is called the "shipping trust." We have got a cement trust, and a trust on almost every other article of everyday consumption and use in this country. I was merely trying to get light from those who ought to know, or ought to find out, before we pass any bill like this, whether or not we could not build a cement mill on the Isthmus, manufacture our own cement there, and save several million dollars, rather than go into the high-faluting programme of transporting everything in American bottoms after making it here at a higher price than it can be made for there, and thus compelling the taxpayers throughout the country to contribute their hard-earned money to help a few of our favored shipowners.

If the facts are that we can manufacture cement on the Isthmus, we certainly can ship petroleum from Texas down there, or get coal from somewhere that we could use for fuel, and I for one can not see for the life of me why a cement mill sufficient in size to keep pace with the needs of the Commission in constructing the canal should not be built, instead of going into this programme of requiring the engineers to pay whatever prices the cement trust and the ship trust combined shall see fit to charge them. That is all I want to say about it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, one thought has come to my mind in connection with the joint resolution which I think it is important we should carefully consider. As I understand the joint resolution, the contracts which are contemplated are contracts where the material is to be delivered at Panama by the party who sells it. If I am in error in that, of course what I am saying about it is not pertinent. I think there can be no doubt about that being the case; otherwise the language would not be as it is:

That in any contract hereafter made transportation by sea of material and equipment from the United States for use in the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to vessels owned by the United States or by the Panama Railroad Company, or to vessels of the United States tendered by the lowest responsible bidder.

It evidently contemplates that bids will be asked for material to be delivered at Panama. Now, a bidder under those circumstances must take into consideration not simply the cost of material, but the cost of transportation, in order that he may bid advisedly. In order that he may make a bid intelligently he must be able to determine definitely what the transportation cost to him will be, because he himself will have to pay the transportation cost, and the transportation cost necessarily enters into the cost of the material to be delivered by him. It is therefore necessary that parties should be enabled to determine with accuracy what the cost of transportation will be. It will not be sufficient, to enable him to calculate with any degree of certainty, for him to know that he can under some circumstances ship by foreign ships and under other circumstances on American ships. In the one case the cost will be much greater than in the other, and so long as the uncertainty remains whether his cost will be the cost of transportation by foreign ships or by American ships it will be impossible for him to make an intelligent bid.

Mr. President, the pertinent fact, so far as concerns my section of the country, is this: We are one of the largest lumber-producing sections of the country; certainly among the largest, if not the largest, within convenient access to the Panama Canal. The port of Savannah and the port of Brunswick are two of the largest lumber-exporting ports of the United States. I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject to form an idea whether naval stores in any particular will enter into the material necessary for the construction of the canal. But, if so, it is a matter of additional importance to my section, for the reason that the port of Savannah is the largest naval stores port in the whole world and necessarily will be in a position to furnish a very large part of this material, if any of it does enter into the construction of the canal or into any of the works which are in any degree related to that construction.

Now, take the case of lumber, for instance, because we all know that lumber will enter into the construction of the canal, and that when bids are asked for the furnishing of lumber, a lumber dealer sits down and calculates whether or not he can make a bid on lumber to go to Panama. He knows the price at which he can furnish the lumber at a reasonable profit to himself; but he has to go further and calculate what it will cost him to deliver the lumber at Panama. Under the terms of the joint resolution he will not know until he comes to ship his lumber whether he will be able to ship it upon a foreign vessel or whether he will be required to ship it upon an American vessel, because at last it will depend upon the determination of the President in his discretion; and so long as that condition of uncertainty lasts it is an utter impossibility for a man who desires to make a bid for the furnishing of lumber to make a bid in which he may have a certainty that it will not result in great loss to him if it is accepted. His bid will be so much per thousand or per hundred thousand or per million, as the case may be, for lumber to be delivered on the Zone, at Colon, and he will make the bid knowing what the lumber will cost him and the price at which he can afford to furnish it, but in utter ignorance of what it will cost him to transport the lumber to the Isthmus.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to ask the Senator a question for information. From which port on the Gulf coast and the southern Atlantic coast is the greatest amount of lumber shipped? Which are the principal lumber ports?

Mr. BACON. I am not able to give the Senator any definite figures. There was, for a long time, a very much larger supply of lumber from the ports of Savannah and Brunswick than there was from the ports of the Gulf, and also the Florida ports on the Atlantic——

Mr. FULTON. On the Gulf, does the Senator know?

Mr. BACON. The Senator did not let me complete my answer. I do not wish to take him off the floor, but I hope he will permit me to answer the question he has asked.

In recent years there has been, to some extent, an exhaustion of the timber which formerly furnished lumber to those particular ports in Georgia which I have mentioned, and the industry has been in some degree transferred to Mississippi, and, I presume, also to Louisiana and Texas, though of that I am not so fully informed. What I say about the ports of Savannah and Brunswick, as lumber ports, is applicable, in a degree, to the ports of Fernandina and Jacksonville and Pensacola and Mobile and New Orleans and Galveston.

Mr. FULTON. All large lumber ports?

Mr. BACON. They are the principal lumber ports of the United States, and I do not suppose there will be a stick of lumber sent to the Panama Canal from the east coast north of Wilmington, N. C. It all has to go from south of Cape Charles; possibly, I may say, from south of Wilmington, N. C., on the Atlantic coast and around on the Gulf down to Galveston.

As is suggested to me by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO], there is no yellow pine north of Wilmington, N. C., and I think we may safely say that all of the lumber on the east coast of the United States that will go into the construction of the Panama Canal will necessarily be lumber shipped between the ports of Wilmington, N. C., and Galveston, Tex., and there is not a single one of those ports——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator certainly does not intend to be understood as saying that all the lumber practically to be employed in the construction of the Panama Canal will be shipped from the ports he has just mentioned.

Mr. BACON. I did not say so.

Mr. FULTON. I so understood him.

Mr. BACON. I said all the lumber shipped from the east coast of the United States would be shipped from those ports.

Mr. FULTON. The east coast!

Mr. BACON. I said the east coast. If the Senator will examine the Reporter's notes he will find that I did. I weighed my words when I used them.

Mr. FULTON. I am perfectly willing to accept the Senator's word on that.

Mr. BACON. Nobody will disparage the vast supply of timber on the Pacific coast. Anybody reasonably informed knows the tremendous amount of it and its value. Of course the Senator realizes, as suggested by the Senator from Maine, that it is more difficult to get lumber from Oregon to the canal than it is from the southern ports of the United States.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me right here, I do not see that it would be any more difficult to get it from the Northwest than to get it from the Gulf ports. The distance, of course is a little less——

Mr. BACON. I will concede that, if the Senator desires it, and therefore I will ask the Senator——

Mr. FULTON. The Senator will permit me. But if the Gulf ports shall be given, as proposed by the amendment which has been accepted, the right to employ foreign vessels in shipping its products of lumber to Panama and the Northwest shall be restricted to American vessels, unless the difference in freights shall be unreasonable, the Senator will admit, of course, that the Northwest would have no possible show in competition with Gulf ports.

Mr. BACON. That would be true. I do not think, however, that that is the design of the present phraseology of the joint resolution.

Mr. FULTON. It does not make much difference to the shippers whether it is the design, so long as it is the result.

Mr. BACON. Yes. I am addressing myself to the question, What will be the condition if that alternative is made applicable to every port of the United States? I am speaking of what the result will be if the joint resolution is so framed that, as to every port in the United States whence a shipment of material of any character whatever is to be made to the Zone, it is left in a condition where it may be shipped by a foreign vessel or it may be required to be shipped by an American vessel—from any port, it matters not what. The bidder will be in doubt as to how he can bid, because he will not be informed whether he can ship it by a foreign vessel or whether he will be compelled to ship it by an American vessel, and in the one case the cost will be greater than in the other. How can he frame his bid intelligently?

Now, if the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon were carried out, that the joint resolution shall specify a certain rate of percentage which would be allowed to the American vessel, then a bidder might make his bid intelligently. He might make it upon the basis of the shipment by a foreign vessel with an alternative bid of a certain percentage added if by an American vessel; but as it now stands no man can tell when he makes his bid whether the President of the United States is going to determine that the rate charged by the American vessel is reasonable or unreasonable, and therefore when he makes his bid it is impossible to know whether he is to pay a high rate of freight or whether he will be permitted to ship it at a low rate of freight. How is it possible for one to make a bid, with any possible security to himself, to deliver material upon the Canal Zone when he does not know whether he is going to be required to pay a high rate or a low rate?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. General Goethals raised that point in his letter, and he said they could not make their bids. Later on he wrote to the Secretary of War a letter, which I have in my hand, and which I should like to have printed, in answer to the proposition the Senator makes. In it he says that Mr. Maxwell, the president of the company, says there is no difficulty at all and that responsible concerns are ready to make bids to deliver. Shall I have it printed?

Mr. BACON. The Senator offers something in reply to what I say. If he has any explanation to make of that proposition I shall be glad to have it from him. How, when it is uncertain——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am replying to that. I am not making objection to his printing anything, but that is not sufficient for what I desire.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let it be read.

Mr. FRYE. Shall it be read?

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read.

Mr. BACON. I am willing.

Mr. FRYE. I believe it is a reply, to a certain extent, to what the Senator from Georgia is saying.

Mr. BACON. I will, with pleasure, pause long enough to have it read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION,
Washington, February 20, 1908.

Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In my letter of February 7, reporting on the Senate resolution requiring the transportation of all supplies to the Isthmus to be made in vessels owned or chartered by the Panama Railroad, or in vessels of American registry, I stated that Mr. Maxwell, president of the Atlas Portland Cement Company, advised me that it would be impossible for his company to make a bid on cement delivered in American bottoms. I am in receipt this day of a letter signed by Mr. Maxwell, the president of the company, to the effect that he has proposals from several responsible concerns who are ready and willing to enter into an agreement for furnishing the necessary vessels of American registry for the transportation of the cement. I request that this information be given to the Senate committee having charge of the resolution; and in this same connection I beg to advise that Mr. Francis T. Bowles, president of the Fore River Shipbuilding Company, of Quincy, Mass., has furnished me with the following list of vessels and their net tonnage, which should be added to the list of vessels furnished by the Commissioner of Navigation:

Name.	Net tons.	Name.	Net tons.
Everett	3,301	Ocmulgee	2,042
Malden	3,301	Ogeechee	2,039
Melrose	3,301	Ossabaw	2,043
Satilla	2,044	Altamaha	2,046

Respectfully,

GEO. W. GOETHALS,
Chairman and Chief Engineer.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. There is not the slightest difficulty in their making bids. The proposals were offered in an alternative form by the Department—so much carried in foreign bottoms and so much carried in American bottoms, and the bids correspond to the proposals.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator mean that is already being done?

Mr. LODGE. That is being done now in regard to supplies for the Panama Canal. For the cement the bids were issued in what is known as the "alternative form." It is one of the simplest business propositions to be imagined.

Mr. BACON. But there is now, as I understand, no such requirement as that proposed to be made?

Mr. LODGE. There is none; but that does not prevent the Department from asking for such bids. Does the Senator want to prevent the Department from using an American vessel if it can get it?

Mr. BACON. It does not prevent the Department, but it does not require it to do it.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. BACON. I propose to require it to do it.

Mr. LODGE. But the Secretary of War ordered alternative bids—"how much will the cement cost brought in foreign bottoms; how much will you furnish the cement for if brought in American bottoms?" The Senator appears to object to even giving the American the poor chance to bid.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is not justified in saying that. Nothing I have said would warrant him saying it—not the slightest thing I have said. On the contrary, I myself suggested that if the joint resolution were so framed that the bids could be made in the alternative, then the end could be accomplished. Senators will certainly recollect my making that suggestion.

Mr. President, the Senator replies that that is the practice of the Department now. If so, it is a good practice.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say it was the practice. I said that is what they have done in the case under discussion. I hold the proposals in my hand.

Mr. BACON. That means practice. If they have done that, they have done what they ought to have done. They have done the exact thing which I suggested ought to be required to be done in the joint resolution. But I am not content with the fact that the Department can do it. I want it so fixed that they will be required to do it. I want the joint resolution so framed that they can not do otherwise, because if they can do otherwise there is an opportunity for great injustice to those who have a right to take part in bidding for the material for the canal.

I do not know whether the suggestion I make meets with the approbation of the Senator from Maine or not. I should think the fact, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, that it is now the recognized proper thing to do, would relieve the situation from any possible suggestion of any impropriety to incorporate it in the law and make it obligatory. Unless it is incorporated in the law it remains absolutely within the control of the Department officer, and while I have every confidence in the present Department officer, nobody knows how long he is to remain, and nobody knows when even the wisest man may change his mind and adopt a different policy.

Mr. President, in reply to the letter, which was read at the instance of the Senator from Maine, I will say the fact that the cement people may have found, after having originally objected to this plan, that they could make arrangements for the shipment of cement which would be satisfactory to them and which would enable them to bid intelligently, does not remove the difficulty as to other shippers. The cement people require an altogether different type of ship; the internal arrangements are not the same. It may be entirely true that arrangements can be made, and have been made, by these large producers of cement for the transportation of their product, having in view one great immense contract possibly, which enables them to put under their control a very large fleet of vessels and make an arrangement which will carry them through the entire contract. That is a very different thing from the lumber industry, which has a dozen ports on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts through which the shipments are made, each of them independent concerns, each of them having to make separate contracts, some of them making small contracts and some large contracts where it is not practicable that there should be an arrangement with some fleet of ships to carry all the lumber that is to be furnished during the time of the construction of the canal, as it is possible in the case of cement, where the largest part, if not the whole of it, is to be furnished by one party.

It is necessary that there should be some general rule, so that when any man who has a lumber plant wishes to sit down and calculate on making a bid to supply lumber for the construction of the canal, he may know that he can bid with certainty in the alternative, if you please, and without danger that he may make a bid upon which he will make a large loss when, in the discretion of an officer, he may be required to ship in an American bottom when he expected to be able to ship in foreign bottoms.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. How does the Senator think it would do to apply to the material and equipment for the canal the same principle that he is applying to transportation—let them buy their lumber and cement wherever in the world they can get them the cheapest?

Mr. BACON. It is not necessary to go into that question now. We discussed that a year or two ago.

Mr. LODGE. Why do they not stand on the same footing? Why should transportation alone be discriminated against?

Mr. BACON. They do not stand on the same footing for this reason: There is material in this country——

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and there are ships here.

Mr. BACON. It does not seem a certainty that there are sufficient ships here.

Mr. LODGE. There are any number. A list of them has been put in the RECORD to-day.

Mr. BACON. Then, why have the alternative?

Mr. LODGE. Why have the alternative bids?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Because under the law foreign ships can underbid us, and under those circumstances the officers of the Department would have no right to give a contract to an American ship.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Wait a moment. And under the law as it now stands the Department must buy cement and lumber at a higher price than they can get it elsewhere. But we are not to apply that principle to the ships. We are not to apply it to the seamen. But all the other American industries must have that preference given to them.

Mr. BACON. The Senator again makes an assertion of my position which is unwarranted by anything I have said.

Mr. LODGE. I am not asserting the Senator's position. I am asserting the facts in the case.

Mr. BACON. The question which I ask the Senator is this: If there is a sufficiency of American ships, why is it that it should be provided in the joint resolution that in a certain case they may employ foreign ships? The Senator bases his contention upon the fact that there is a sufficiency of ships.

Mr. LODGE. I will answer that question.

Mr. BACON. If so, why put this other provision in at all?

Mr. LODGE. I will answer that question when the Senator answers mine; and that is, Why apply one rule to lumber and cement and other supplies and say they shall be bought only in the United States, and yet, as to transportation, provide that it must be open to the competition of the world? When the Senator answers that question I will answer his question, which is very easily answered.

Mr. BACON. I have never said it should be open to the competition of the world.

Mr. LODGE. That is the case to-day, and we are trying to give American ships a gentle preference, nothing more; not exclusion, but a mere preference.

Mr. BACON. I am discussing the particular effect of this joint resolution as it is written. The joint resolution as it is written leaves it open for the President to determine whether or not a bidder shall be required to ship the material which he offers to furnish in an American vessel or in a foreign vessel. That is the point I am after—that the bidder, when he sits down to make his calculation and his bid thereon, will not know whether he is to ship it in a foreign vessel or in an American vessel; and the suggestion which I will make now is that the phraseology of the joint resolution be so changed that what the Senator says the Department is now doing as a matter of volition it shall be required to do, and not be permitted to do otherwise. That is what I am contending for. In other words, that it shall be required——

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FRYE. If that was required in the joint resolution, what would become of the preference?

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether the Senator understood me or not.

Mr. FRYE. What would become of the preference which the joint resolution provides for American ships?

Mr. BACON. I am sure the Senator does not understand me, or he would not ask that question. My proposition is that it shall be required in the joint resolution that a bidder shall be allowed to make an alternative bid—so much if shipped in a foreign vessel, so much if shipped in an American vessel—dependent on when the President of the United States determines that he can not ship it in a foreign vessel, or when he determines that he may ship it in a foreign vessel. If the President determines that he may ship by foreign vessel, of course the bid which includes the shipment by the foreign vessel is the bid by which the contractor is bound. If, on the contrary, he holds that the offer of transportation by an American vessel is not unreasonable, then the bid which is made for shipment by American vessel is the one which is in force. It does not seem to me that that puts anybody at any disadvantage, and I am sure the Senator did not understand that or he would not have made the inquiry of me he did.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to remind the Senator from Georgia that I have some recollection—my memory is getting very poor, but still I think I read something of the kind—that in the inception of our work on the Isthmus there was considerable racket in the newspapers because American shipowners put the freight rates so high that the President and Secretary of War gave notice that they would not be held up by the American shipping trust, and that they would employ vessels anywhere they saw fit. Have we not some foreign ships now chartered on the Isthmus by the Commission?

Mr. GALLINGER. One.

Mr. LODGE. We have the ships that belonged to the Panama Railway Company. They became the property of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Are there no others?

Mr. GALLINGER. There is one foreign ship, which is excepted in the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. There is one foreign ship.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why did we get the foreign ship?

Mr. LODGE. I suppose because it did not have enough to do in the business of the railroad company.

Mr. TILLMAN. If they have not enough ships to do the business of the Panama Canal Commission, why not let them hire or charter some foreign ships?

Mr. LODGE. The Commission themselves want to control the ships. They should be ships of the United States. Foreigners would not do it cheap enough.

Mr. TILLMAN. If foreigners will not bid lower than the American shipowner, let the American take it. Why not let them compete in the markets of the world on this matter and save the money to the taxpayers?

Mr. LODGE. Very well, let us have competition in the markets of the world, and buy the lumber and buy the cement, and buy all the materials and equipment.

Mr. TILLMAN. As a taxpayer representing some farmers I should like powerfully well to have that done, and get the canal built at the very lowest dollar possible.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator voted with the rest of us for the law which excluded from competition the material and equipment of the rest of the world.

Mr. TILLMAN. How does the Senator know how I voted?

Mr. LODGE. I think it is a matter of record.

Mr. TILLMAN. I may have done so; because I slide along here with a great many things to which I am opposed; because I can not help myself. I am tied to the machine and have to go with it. Your party has a two-thirds majority in the Senate, and if the law to which the Senator now objects is on the statute books he and his party are responsible for this discrimination against American shipping. Why did you not put in the bill when the original law was passed a provision that supplies shall be carried in American bottoms? Why did you not put that in?

Mr. LODGE. Because there was a question then about the coastwise traffic, as I understand it. If we bring Panama under the coastwise laws there will not be any trouble.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course not; but we have brought it under the flag. It is a part and parcel of the country now. We have got a governor there and we are spending hundreds of millions of dollars there. It is a great public work in which all of us are interested, and the taxpayers have got to pay for it.

Mr. LODGE. But that does not make it a part of the country. The Senator knows very well the law distinctly states that we simply take the control of it. The sovereignty of the territory would not pass to us.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think I have got possession of something in my pocket, and am using it to suit my own convenience. I think it is practically mine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not if you borrowed it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who borrowed the Panama Canal? We paid $40,000,000 to France, and we are going to pay I do not know how much more before we get it built. How do you call it borrowing?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. I apologize to the Senator for having strayed off from the point I tried to make.

Mr. BACON. I excuse the Senator. I do not know how the Senator from South Carolina voted on that question, and I would not be willing——

Mr. TILLMAN. BACON comes before TILLMAN, and I followed you.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator would always do that, he would be right more frequently than he is.

As I was about to say, I would not be willing to say positively that I voted against it, but my recollection is that I voted against it and spoke against it.

Mr. LODGE. Against confining it to American ships?

Mr. BACON. Yes. I know the Senator desires to have that in order that it may be a little campaign capital, and I am willing to give it to him.

Mr. LODGE. No; that is not sufficient. As campaign capital it may be de minimis.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, there is likely to be need, in the near future, of some contributions for campaign uses, and that makes it very necessary that American ships should be used in carrying material and these supplies. Is that it?

Mr. BACON. If I recollect correctly, I took the position, when that question was before the Senate, that whatever might be said in regard to the general subject of protection, and however proper it might be as a national policy, I did not think that in this great national enterprise, where the cost of it must fall upon the entire people without distinction as to class or of occupation, it should be required to cost one dollar more than it must necessarily cost to complete it, and that those who were the recipients of the benefits of the protective tariff policy ought to be content with the great rewards which they have under the present tariff law, which our friends are so prolific in promises for the revision of, but which they never revise; that they ought to be content with that and not insist that it should levy another tribute upon the American people when they come to the great sacrifice, because sacrifice it is, in the construction of this work. I think that was the attitude which I occupied then. If I did not, I think so now.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to ask the Senator if he will not yield to me that I may make a suggestion right in connection with what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said. The Senator inquires if we are going to protect our materials and if we are going to require that the canal work shall be carried on and the canal constructed by materials supplied by the United States, why not extend it to the shipping?

I say to the Senator while I believe just as strongly in the doctrine of protection as he does and will go just as far along lines of principle for permanent results and effect as he will, yet he must remember that this is a work that will not extend over more than a few years and what we might do if we were going to employ a policy that would extend far into the future for the purpose of building up our shipping would be one thing, but to compel these supplies to be carried only in American ships when the proposition is practically one contract, extending only over a few years, the different sections of the country can not prepare for it, can not arrange to provide American ships so as to do the work. Before the ships can be provided the work will have been completed.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LODGE. This bill is not exclusive. It only gives the Department the opportunity to take an American vessel, even if it has to pay it somewhat higher than it would pay a foreign tramp.

As to the lumber and cement and other material and equipment, it is exclusive; and I think that is right. They have to take it at higher rates if the rates asked here are higher. I am entirely willing and desirous, and I think it is right, that all this great expenditure for the canal shall be made as far as possible in the United States, and the money returned to the taxpayers in that way even if it costs a little more. But I do not think it is just to give the American ship and the American seaman no chance at all. This is merely to enable them when there is an opportunity to give it to an American ship to do it, even if it costs a little more.

I ask leave to have printed the form in the alternative bid, which I have marked.

Mr. BACON. I hope it may be read in order that I may make a suggestion as to an amendment in relation to it.

Mr. LODGE. It is the bid. The Senator can not amend the proposals of the Department.

Mr. BACON. I wanted the form of the alternative.

Mr. LODGE. I have marked it. It can be read.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A. Furnishing the entire supply at the prescribed rate of delivery—
1. On docks within reach of ship's tackle at seaports of the United States named by the bidder.
2. On docks, at the option of the bidder at Colon or La Boca (1) in steamships of American register; (2) in steamships of foreign register.
B. Furnishing any portion of the entire supply to be named by the bidder, deliveries at a uniform rate to extend over a period of three years. The period of deliveries, however, may be contracted or enlarged by decreasing or increasing the rate of delivery as provided for in paragraph 3—
1. On docks within reach of ship's tackle at seaports of the United States named by the bidder.
2. On docks, at the option of the bidder at Colon or La Boca (1) in steamships of American register; (2) in steamships of foreign register.
C. Furnishing one-third of the total amount, or a less portion to be named by the bidder, deliveries to be completed in one year at a uniform rate, subject to the provisions of paragraph 3—
1. On docks within reach of ship's tackle at seaports of the United States named by the bidder.
2. On docks, at the option of the bidder at Colon or La Boca (1) in steamships of American register; (2) in steamships of foreign register.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. It is evident that this measure is not going to be disposed of before 2 o'clock. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has given notice that he desires to speak at 2. It is important that the joint resolution shall receive early consideration at any rate on account of the bids to be made. I ask unanimous consent that its consideration may be resumed tomorrow morning immediately after——

Mr. GALLINGER. The shipping bill will come up to-morrow.

Mr. FRYE. That will not do. I had the shipping bill set down for to-morrow. I ask, then, that Wednesday——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I beg to say to the Senator that I intend to address the Senate immediately after the conclusion of the morning business on Wednesday. The Senator can take up the joint resolution at 2 o'clock or somewhat later. I shall occupy probably an hour.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the joint resolution may be taken up Wednesday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I wanted to propose an amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator will not do that now. I want to get an arrangement before it gets to be 2 o'clock, and leaves me high and dry, by which the joint resolution shall be considered.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I thought perhaps the Senator could pass it if this amendment is accepted.

Mr. FRYE. No; there are only five minutes more.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. There are ten minutes more.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the pending joint resolution be taken up for consideration immediately after the routine morning business on Wednesday, the 11th.

Mr. FRYE. That was objected to by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps the Senator from Arkansas would be willing to speak at 2.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; I want to start just after the morning business.

Mr. FRYE. After the Senator from Arkansas has completed his speech on Wednesday.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I can not consent to that, because I desire to address the Senate on Senate bill 3023 the first time that I can get the floor after the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] shall have addressed the Senate. That may be to-morrow or Wednesday or Thursday, and I can not consent to that arrangement until after I shall feel free on that point.

Mr. FRYE. Then I will except from the unanimous-consent agreement the time to be occupied by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I shall not object if that is the understanding.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I want to get a unanimous-consent agreement now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine will kindly restate his request as modified.

Mr. FRYE. It is that on Wednesday next, after the speeches of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] have been completed, this joint resolution shall be taken up for consideration.

Mr. McLAURIN. I wish to say in this connection that I may get an opportunity to get the floor to-morrow, and if so, I will endeavor to address the Senate then.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be taken up for consideration on Wednesday next after the speeches of the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Mississippi have been completed.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine in case those two speeches should occupy the larger part of the day, whether he would wish to take up the joint resolution late in the afternoon.

Mr. FRYE. I would take it up at the time, and if it became necessary I would get further consent, if I could get it through the kindness of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will not get it up too late in the afternoon?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir.

Mr. TELLER. It does not seem to me that there is such haste about this measure as to require us to depart from the usual custom. The Senator from Maine can make that motion when the time comes.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Colorado will not object.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care about agreeing beforehand to take up and dispose of the bill.

Mr. FRYE. My request is not to dispose of it on Wednesday. I said to take it up for consideration on that day.

Mr. TELLER. I want to submit a few remarks on the joint resolution, and I shall probably occupy ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. FRYE. These bids will have to be opened in April, and if the joint resolution is to be of any use, it ought to be passed early. I hope the Senator will not object to Wednesday next, after the speeches have been made.

Mr. TELLER. I will not if the Senator gives us to understand that he is not going to press it to a vote.

Mr. BACON. Does it make it the unfinished business?

Mr. FRYE. No.

Mr. BACON. It only relates to that day?

Mr. FRYE. It relates to that day only.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer an amendment to the pending joint resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the word "charter," to insert "or construct," so as to read:

That the Isthmian Canal Commission is hereby authorized to purchase or charter or construct.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] will offer his amendment now and have it read.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I move to amend the amendment by inserting before the words "Gulf ports," the words "South Atlantic or."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the words "Gulf ports" insert "South Atlantic or," so as to read:

Provided, That this resolution shall not apply to the South Atlantic or Gulf ports, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine desire to have a reprint of the joint resolution with the amendments?

Mr. FRYE. I would be glad to have the joint resolution reprinted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks that the joint resolution, with the pending amendments, be reprinted. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FRYE. Let the joint resolution as amended to-day be reprinted, with the additional proposed amendments in italics.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so ordered, in the absence of objection.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I will address the Senate upon the bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce."

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3023.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

There is no contract, public or private; no engagement, national or individual, which is unaffected by it. The enterprises of commerce, the profits of trade, the arrangements made in all the domestic relations of society, the wages of labor, pecuniary transactions of the highest amount and the lowest, the payment of the national debt, the provision for the national expenditure, the command which the coin of the lowest denomination has over the necessaries of life, are all affected by the decision to which we may come.

These are the words in which Sir Robert Peel began his great speech on the bill to recharter the Bank of England in 1844; and they do not exaggerate the importance of currency legislation. It is, however, a happy circumstance for mankind that the difficulty of the subject is not so great as the importance of it. Indeed, sir, it is, perhaps, the simplest of all the great problems which governments must solve; and unlike many other important questions there is an universal agreement upon what we may call, with a fair degree of accuracy, its first principles. (Every man believes that the currency ought to be sufficient in volume to meet the requirements of agriculture, commerce, manufacture, transportation, and all other legitimate pursuits; nor is there any dissent from the proposition that every note in circulation should be above any reasonable suspicion against its value.) It is true, sir, that men of the widest experience and of the ripest wisdom will disagree as to what constitutes a sufficient volume of currency, and even when they can reconcile their conflicting opinions on that point, they will still differ over the best means of assuring its value; but these are differences over matters of detail, and they can be reduced by mutual and safe concessions to an agreement among men who understand the general question and who sincerely desire to do what is best for our country.

A practical test will always demonstrate whether the currency is deficient or redundant, because either error will manifest itself in the most unmistakable way. On the one hand, if the volume is not sufficient, we will witness a general fall of prices, a curtailment of production, and a restriction of business in all lines. On the other hand, an excessive issue will be followed by artificially high prices, stimulating an unhealthy development, and culminating at last in an era of injurious speculation. But, sir, while it is thus easy to detect the over-issue or the under-issue of currency, it is not so easy to correct the mistake after it has been discovered. No matter how well the cause of the derangement may be understood, or how plain the proper remedy may be, it will not always happen that those who are charged with the duty of making our laws will have the wisdom and the courage to act promptly and with firmness. If there be a deficiency, and therefore an increase is demanded, creditors will resist that increase and denounce it as an effort to partially repudiate all debts. If there be a redundancy, and it is therefore necessary to withdraw a part, debtors will resist that withdrawal and denounce it as tantamount to a confiscation of their property. Both contentions are perfectly sound, and, looking at the matter purely from their personal point of view, each class is fully justified in its position. It is undoubtedly true that a considerable addition to the currency will raise prices and enable all debtors to discharge their obligations with less property; nor is there the slightest doubt that a considerable subtraction from the currency will lower prices and thus compel every debtor to part with more of his property in order to pay his debts.

THE GOVERNMENT'S DUTY.

I do not ignore this phase of the question, nor am I indifferent to the injustice which may be wrought; but I hold that it is the duty of the Government to provide, and to maintain, at all times and under all circumstances, an adequate volume of currency; and it must not fail in the performance of that duty, because it may do an injustice to one or to another class. We must not leave the country to endure the continuous fall of prices and the stagnation of business which inevitably result from an insufficient volume of money; nor must we wait until a speculative mania, which always follows an inflation, has debauched the conscience and prostrated the energies of the Republic. A resolute and a sensible Congress will not permit our people to suffer under either evil because its correction would be unjust to some men, or even to many men. Of course, this Government ought never to do anybody an injustice where it is possible to avoid it; but as between the injustice of a day and to a particular class, and the injustice of years and to many classes, no wise legislator can hesitate. It is infinitely better to inflict an injury upon a single class that will suffer and recover from it in due season than it is to perpetuate a wrong through all time and against all other classes.

I am not unmindful that prices will adjust themselves to any volume of money, and if the relation between the supply of and the demand for money could remain the same, neither debtor nor creditor would be injuriously affected by any change in its volume; because the same amount of labor or commodities, other things being equal, would command precisely the same amount of money; and the same amount of money, other things being equal, would command precisely the same amount of labor or commodities. This rule, as stated with the qualification of "other things being equal," leaves the wages of labor to rise with an increase in labor's skill; and leaves all other commodities subject to those influences which relate only to them. This, Mr. President, would, in that aspect at least, be an ideal financial system. It would be one under which a man who borrows money to-day promising to repay it in twenty years would return to his creditor a dollar of precisely the same purchasing power as the one which he borrowed; but while it would be ideal, it is unattainable, and all that the wisest statesmen can hope is to approach it as nearly as possible.

AN EMERGENCY PROVISION NECESSARY.

But, Mr. President, under a financial system as perfect as I have just described, it will frequently happen in a new and rapidly developing country like ours that extraordinary situations will arise and extraordinary provision must be made to meet them. No matter how we may differ as to the causes of our panics, it is enough to know that they come upon us from time to time; and it is too much to hope that we will ever reach a period when we will be altogether free from such disturbances. Knowing that emergencies will come, we should equip ourselves to deal with them, for nothing could be plainer than that a volume of currency which is entirely adequate for normal times and under normal conditions is entirely inadequate for abnormal times and under abnormal conditions.

Not only is the necessity for an emergency provision in our financial system fully established by our own experience, but we also have the experience of other countries to instruct us to the same effect. I think it will be conceded by all that the greatest commercial nations of the Old World are Great Britain, Germany, and France; and a study of their financial history will lead us irresistibly to the conclusion that panics can be rendered less frequent and less severe by a wise anticipation of them. The financial systems of Germany and France provide for such emergencies as that through which we have recently passed, and have reduced the evil consequences of them to a minimum. The law of Great Britain distinctly forbids the relief which these extraordinary occasions demand; but their law in that respect has been repeatedly disregarded with the express sanction of the King's ministers. Within three years after the law of 1844 was enacted the English people were confronted with a serious financial condition, and a panic was only averted by the announcement that the Bank of England would issue notes and continue to discount acceptable paper without regard to the limitation which permitted it to issue additional notes only upon the deposit of an equal amount of gold. The law was explicit; and the author of it, when advocating it before the British Parliament, had avowed his intention to confine the issue of bank notes within the strictest limits; but when it became apparent to every sagacious business man and to the public authorities that the inability of the bank to accommodate its customers would involve the British people in great losses and in a widespread disaster, the chancellor of the exchequer advised the governor and the directors of the bank to disregard the limitation on their right to issue notes, and pledged himself to ask Parliament for an act indemnifying them for their violation of the law. Almost immediately after that announcement was made public the unrest disappeared, confidence was restored, and the danger of a panic passed without the bank having to issue a single note in excess of its legal right.

Again, in 1857, the hard-and-fast limitation on the volume of currency threatened a commercial and an industrial collapse; and again the chancellor of the exchequer advised the bank to pursue the same course to which it had resorted with such gratifying results ten years before. In this second instance the strain was so great that the bank was compelled to issue notes beyond what the act of 1844 allowed, but the overissue was not very great and continued for less than three weeks. The great failure of Overend & Co., in 1866, once more exemplified that a financial system admirably adapted to usual conditions could not be successfully applied to unusual conditions; and for a third time in twenty-two years those responsible for the administration of the Government were compelled to sanction a violation of their laws and to promise the bank indemnity for an overissue of its notes. It happened in 1866, as it had in 1847, that the determination of the bank to meet the extraordinary requirements by an overissue of its notes restored public confidence and prevented a panic without the issue of a dollar beyond the limit prescribed by the law. These several instances have become precedents in English finance; and the English people now proceed upon the theory that the limitation of the bank act will be suspended whenever the public good requires it. Thus it may well be said that while the bank act itself is rigid to the utmost degree, it is so administered as to provide for emergencies when they occur. I can not, however, approve a policy which requires bank officers to disregard the law, even under a promise of indemnity from public officials. I believe that the law ought to be administered by all executive officers exactly as it has been written by the legislative department, and I do not cite the example of England as one deserving our imitation, but only to show that, while the law itself in that country has not provided for emergencies, the officers of the Government have met each emergency outside of and contrary to the law.

What was authorized by the ministers in England has been permitted by the Treasury officials here in an effort to extricate ourselves from financial difficulties. The refusal of the banks to pay the checks of their depositors in cash, and the use of more than $250,000,000 of clearing-house certificates and other devices without the payment of the tax which the statute imposes, was in plain contravention of our law; and yet our most law-abiding citizens have tacitly approved those illegal measures as necessary to prevent a great catastrophe. These extra-legal or unlawful processes will not be tolerated in this country as they have been in England, and can not save us as they have saved the British people; but even if they could, it would still be infinitely better, Mr. President, for us to provide a lawful way in which these financial distresses can be prevented or mitigated than it is to continue a system which makes no provision for them, and then condone by our silence a palpable violation of the law. But, sir, I do not need to consume the time of the Senate in an argument to prove that we ought to erect barriers against which these financial storms must spend their greatest force. The Committee on Finance was practically unanimous in favor of some suitable provision on that behalf, and I take it for granted that an overwhelming majority of the Senate concur in their opinion.

Both the bill of the majority and the substitute of the minority provide for an issue of $500,000,000; and they have been assailed from opposite directions and with opposite arguments. Some critics denounce them as a dangerous inflation; and others declare that they will fail to give any relief, because they are too exacting in the security which they require. I might repeat those criticisms in detail, and thus make each answer the other; but I believe I can employ the time of the Senate better in exposing the fallacy of both.

OPPOSED TO INFLATION.

Mr. President, I am as much opposed to inflation as any living man; and I am opposed to it both as a matter of principle and as a matter of duty to my constituents. The intelligent and industrious men in Texas who are engaged in the cultivation of cotton would suffer much by an inflation of the currency, which would increase the price of almost every article which they buy; and they would not benefit by the general rise of prices thus produced, because the price of their cotton is fixed in the great markets of the world where the currency of the United States exerts no influence over prices. It is universally accepted as an axiom that the currency of a country can only affect the prices of those commodities whose prices are fixed in the local markets of that country; and no amount of currency issued in this country can affect the price of commodities in other countries, except so far, and only so far, as the use of that currency may diminish our demand for gold. This is only another way of stating the obvious economic truth that currency can only act upon prices when and where it is available for making purchases. Perhaps I can better explain and enforce my meaning by an illustration of the manner in which even the use of personal credit may affect prices.

If the magnificent building at the corner of Fourteenth and G streets should be offered at public auction to-morrow under an order of sale that called for the payment of the entire purchase price in cash, there would not be three men in Washington able to bid on that property, and it would be sold at a great sacrifice. If, however, the order of sale provided that one-fourth of the purchase price could be paid in cash, and a liberal credit extended on the other three-fourths, there would probably be ten men ready to bid on it; and under the competition of ten bidders the property would unquestionably fetch a higher price. But the fact that a credit was extended on that property would not directly affect the price of another property which was to be sold entirely for cash. There might be an indirect effect brought about in this way: The purchaser of the property at Fourteenth and G streets by using his credit on that purchase might be left with cash enough to buy the other property. That effect, however, instead of militating against my argument, supports it by showing that the price of any given property can only be affected by something available for its purchase at the very place where the price is fixed.

I do not need, Mr. President, to tell the Senate or the country that the currency of the United States does not circulate in Liverpool, Hamburg, and the other great markets, where the price of cotton is determined. That being true, no addition to our currency, so long as it is kept at par with coin, can add anything to the value of our cotton crop; and the American cotton grower is compelled to accept for his cotton sold in a Texas town the price, minus certain charges, at which the purchaser can sell it in the great markets of the world. Not so, however, with the manufactured and other articles of local production and local consumption which he must buy. Almost every article with which the American farmer feeds and clothes his family, through the agency of the tariff or a combination of manufacturers or some other obstruction to the natural laws of trade, is reduced to a local commodity whose price is fixed in our own markets; and, of course, the volume of currency in circulation here exercises a powerful influence over the price of such commodities. Thus, Mr. President, it would happen that the American cotton planter would be the first and the greatest victim of inflation; and as one having the honor to represent so many of them, I would resist a policy which would sacrifice their interest to that speculative spirit which is never satisfied long with any volume of currency, but which, like the daugther of the horse-leech, is always crying for more.

It does not necessarily follow that because I am opposed to inflation my substitute might not produce it; for the best of us sometimes aim at one result and accomplish an entirely opposite one. But a careful consideration of the measure will show any sensible man that such a fear is wholly unfounded. Its terms and conditions will render it impossible for the $500,000,000, which it authorizes, to become a permanent part of our money supply. I have charged interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum for the first six months, and at the rate of 9 per cent per annum thereafter. The lower rate of 6 per cent would deter any bank from using that money, except under a stress, and the higher rate of 9 per cent would certainly compel its retirement within a reasonable time. It could hardly happen that an emergency, such as is contemplated in this substitute, would exist for longer than six months, and it is practically certain that the banks would return the money to the Treasury before the higher rate of interest became operative.

The entire $500,000,000 which the Aldrich bill allows the banks to issue, and which my substitute requires the Government to deposit, is less than the several sums which the banks themselves improvised during our recent financial crisis. We know that as much as $190,000,000 in clearing-house certificates were used; we know that something like $75,000,000 in checks and notes were issued by the banks, clearing houses, and others; we know that something more than $90,000,000 of national-bank notes were taken out; we know that more than $100,000,000 of gold was imported, and we know that the Government of the United States scraped the bottom of its Treasury for the additional $70,000,000 which it deposited with the banks; and yet, sir, in spite of all this, all of the banks in New York City, as well as many of them in other parts of the country, refused to pay out money over their counters, and limited the right of their depositors to check for cash against the money which belonged to them, and which they had a perfect legal and moral right to demand.

So far from regarding this bill or the substitute as apt to produce an inflation of the currency, I feel that if any mistake has been made at all, that mistake has been made in limiting the amount to $500,000,000 instead of making it $1,000,000,000. No matter how much we might authorize, the rate of interest charged for it would prevent the use of any part of it except under a pressing necessity, and the amount used would be only such as would be absolutely necessary to relieve the money market. I am clearly of the opinion that the larger the amount which could be put in circulation the less apt we would be to need any of it; and that belief is born of and justified by the knowledge that in every impending financial crisis there are many men who deliberately seek to aggravate the trouble. In every community there are Shylocks who are always striving to drive hard bargains with some embarrassed debtor, and they rejoice in a condition which appalls better men. They traffic upon the misfortunes of their neighbors, and they realize their greatest profits out of the general distress. Whenever a monetary convulsion is imminent and other men are seeking to avert it, these Shylocks strive to bring it on. Instead of putting more money into circulation, they withdraw every dollar which they can lay their hands on, and put it aside for the double purpose of creating a panic and then taking advantage of it. They sit like personified greed upon their locked and guarded chests of gold waiting for their victims, and they pray for the hour of the sacrifice to come when they can buy three dollars' worth of their neighbors' property with one dollar of their hoarded money.

I think it perfectly safe to say that as much money was withdrawn from circulation by these men and for this purpose during the last autumn as was withdrawn through the fear of losing it. But, sir, if the American Congress will say to all such men that whenever they lock up their money for the purpose of producing a panic the Government of the United States stands ready to supply its place, we will remove the temptation which now controls them, because we will render impossible the profits which they anticipate under our present system. Of course there is no way of ascertaining how much money these Shylocks withdrew from circulation last year, but when we remember that in every community there are men of this kind, and that each of them can command from several hundred to several thousand dollars, the withdrawals reached a stupendous aggregate; and I doubt very much if the $500,000,000 proposed in this legislation is equal to the money withdrawn by those selfish men and for that sordid purpose.

THE SECURITIES REQUIRED.

The second objection to both the bill and the substitute is that neither will afford any substantial relief, because both exact a security which the banks do not now carry, and which they can not be fairly expected to procure. The banks themselves are particularly insistent upon this objection, and many of them are actuated by a purely selfish motive. They are not satisfied with the extremely profitable dividends which they have been able to pay to their stockholders, and they want the Government to establish a currency system under which they can expect to pay still larger ones. The truth is—and it might as well be stated here and now—that the national banks of this country favor a system of asset currency; and they will labor to defeat any measure which compels them to secure their circulation. They want the privilege of issuing their notes without interest and without security, and lending them to the people for interest and upon security. For my part, I will never support a bill which legalizes such an arrangement; and I shall always insist that the safety of our currency is of infinitely more importance to the country than the size of bank dividends. If the banks must be permitted to issue our currency, they ought to be compelled to secure it so absolutely that no business man, farmer, or wage-earner would ever think it necessary to inquire about the solvency of a bank in order to ascertain the value of its note. The wise men admonish us, Mr. President, that it is never safe to make a prediction which must be falsified or fulfilled within the time of those who hear it; but I will venture to disregard this admonition so far as to record it as my opinion that if my substitute is rejected, and this bill is defeated, Congress will either establish a great central bank of issue within the next ten years or authorize the national banks as now constituted to issue an asset currency; and the men who are now declaiming against a bond-secured currency are promoting, consciously or unconsciously, the scheme of a nonsecured currency.

I have been more than astonished by the attitude of some of my Republican friends on this question. I have heard them talk so much about sound money that I had come to suppose that soundness would always be the first consideration with them; and yet, sir, I now find them advocating a system of currency which, if adopted, would be certain to produce some confusion and doubt about the value of what is intended to be used as money. Senators now occupying seats on that side of the Chamber, and less conspicuous Republicans in every part of the country, have bitterly reproached the Democratic party because we advocated the free coinage of silver; but many of those who once shuddered at the free coinage of silver are now advocating the free issuance of paper. We required the bullion owner to expend some labor or to invest some capital in obtaining the metal into which we proposed to coin the silver dollar, but our opponents are now proposing to let the bankers take a cheap quality of paper and make it into money at their own sweet will. I do not mean to impeach the integrity or the intelligence of the men who support that proposition, but I warn the party in power that if they make it the law of this land they will bring upon our children the miseries which our fathers once suffered through the issuance of unsecured bank notes. It has been a long time, Mr. President, since we have seen any form of our money worth less than its face value; but we must not suppose that such a condition can not come again.

If you authorize banks to issue their notes upon such security only as their general assets will afford you will introduce an element of disquieting uncertainty; and in a time when banks are failing you will make it necessary for every citizen to examine a bank note before he receives it to see whether or not it has been issued by one of the insolvent banks. With bank currency made absolutely secure, no man looks to see what bank issued the note which is offered to him, and he accepts the note of one bank as readily as the note of any other bank; because he knows that all of them are safe beyond any reasonable doubt. But we are now advised by many gentlemen who have so loudly proclaimed themselves the especial friends and champions of a safe currency to adopt a system under which the failure of a single bank will taint every bank note in circulation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BAILEY. Very cheerfully.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Texas is willing to admit that there has not yet been any advocacy in this Chamber of a system such as he is now criticising.

Mr. BAILEY. I know, Mr. President, that up to this time no Republican Senator has spoken in favor of an asset currency; but I also know, and I assume that the Senator from Rhode Island knows it, because he generally knows what is transpiring on that side of the Chamber, that there are Republican Senators who favor it, and I warn him now that he may be compelled to reckon with some of those who hold that view before he passes his bill.

I did not, however, have in my mind the situation in the Senate so much as the situation outside of this body. Of course, the rules of parliamentary decorum do not permit me to comment upon a measure pending in the other branch of Congress, and I have no inclination to do so; but I will be permitted to say to my political adversaries that if they finally yield to the solicitation of the bankers and give them the power to issue their notes with only their general assets as security, they will have forfeited before the world the right to appear hereafter as the friends and the defenders of a sound monetary system. If you tell me that you intend to make every bank's note secure by giving them a prior lien upon the assets of the bank, I answer that such an arrangement will still not make them absolutely secure, because it will sometimes happen that rascals or fools will so completely wreck a bank that its assets will not discharge its notes. A prior lien upon the assets of such a bank would not under all circumstances secure its note holders against loss; and an occasional failure of that kind will generate a feeling under which the notes of even the most solvent banks would circulate less freely.

But, Mr. President, if we admit that you can remove all doubt as to the value of the notes by giving their holders a prior lien upon the assets of the bank, you only avoid one danger by falling into another. Even if you could allay the distrust of the note holder by such a law you would inevitably intensify the distrust of the depositor, and in the end you would do an immeasurable harm. Let us consider for a moment what would happen under such a law when suspicion had once been aroused; when men began to look each other in the face and to ask what of the morrow; when depositors began to wonder if the bank which held their money was solvent, and the most timid of them began quietly to withdraw their deposits. Under such a condition the banks would begin to issue their notes to meet these demands upon them; but do you suppose, sir, that they could thus allay the fear of their depositors? Precisely the contrary would happen, because the depositors would understand that every note issued immediately became a lien superior to their claims against the bank, and they would protect themselves against being reduced to the position of second-lien holders by withdrawing their deposits. Put the case to your own common sense and conscience, and what would you do? If you were the guardian of an orphan, or the attorney for a widow, or an executor under a will, you would hesitate to leave such trust funds with a bank whose solvency was under a suspicion, even though you held, in common with all depositors, a first lien upon its assets; and how much more hastily would you withdraw them when you saw the bank issuing obligations which must be paid before you could recover a dollar, and which might absorb the very money you had deposited. Could you expect the daily wage-earner to leave the little he had been able to save above his living expenses with a bank that was creating a prior lien upon it? To give the bank notes a prior lien would not help us in a time of financial perturbation. Whatever tendency it might have to steady our confidence in bank notes would be more than offset by the lack of confidence which it would create as to the safety of deposits. The American people, whatever else may be said about them, are upon the whole blessed with an uncommon degree of common sense, and they believe, as I do, that the only way for a bank whose solvency is under suspicion to restore confidence in the minds of those who patronize it is to reduce its obligations; but this asset currency proceeds upon the opposite and the absurd theory that a bank can relieve itself from the distrust of those whom it already owes by multiplying the number and the amount of its debts.

Speaking only for myself, I would not vote for any bill that committed to the banks of this country the issuance of money; but as between a bill like that of the Senator from Rhode Island, which compels the banks to secure the notes which it permits them to issue, and another bill which would permit the banks to issue notes without securing them, I have no hesitation in declaring that the bill of the Senator from Rhode Island is incomparably the better. The worst that his bill can do—and God knows that is bad enough—is to let the banks control the volume of our currency in their own interest, but they will at least be compelled to pay every note which they have issued, while under the asset-currency system the banks are given a still larger control over our currency and a more unrestricted power to use it for their own advantage, and then may not be able to pay the notes which they have issued.

The majority bill and the minority substitute both reject the doctrine of an asset currency, the one requiring a special security for the notes to be issued by the banks and the other authorizing the issue of United States notes, but requiring bonds to secure those notes when deposited in the banks by the Government. There is, however, a very important difference between the two in respect to certain bonds which may be received for either purpose. Both accept the bonds of States, counties, municipalities, and districts under certain proper safeguards; but the substitute rejects the railroad bonds which the bill accepts. I am not willing to say that the railway bonds as described in the bill would not be an ample security for the notes issued against them, nor will I contend that there are not other bonds which would make the notes issued against them perfectly secure; but I have chosen the bonds specified in the substitute for two good and sufficient reasons.

In the first place, it has seemed to me peculiarly fit and proper that public money should be protected by a deposit of public securities; and in the second place, I desire to compel the banks of the South, at least, to invest a part of their capital and surplus in the bonds which our States, counties, districts, and municipalities issue and sell from time to time. As matters now stand, practically all of our bonds are sold to investors in the Northern and Eastern States, and large sums are every year sent from our section to pay the interest on those bonds. Under the operation of this law our southern banks will find it to their interest to buy those bonds, and hold them for emergencies, thus making it certain that much of the interest which would otherwise be paid to men in other sections will be kept at home. This will be a distinct gain to our people; and it will be no hardship on the banks. A prudent bank manager will be more than willing to invest a reasonable per cent of his capital and surplus in these bonds, even though they return a lower rate of interest than he could realize on commercial loans, because he will feel that the security which they provide against an evil day is worth more than the difference in the rate of interest; and he will tell his more grasping stockholders who complain that the bank is thus made to sacrifice a profit, that with bank stock paying better than almost any other permanent and legitimate investment they can well afford to abate a small part of their profits in order to make their principal more secure. The banks now keep large sums with their reserve agents upon a rate of interest which seldom exceeds 2 per cent; and they can keep less in that way and invest more in these excellent securities. These bonds will not only bring a higher rate of interest than reserve deposits, but they can be readily converted into cash when an emergency requires it, and the knowledge that the bank has a part of its capital invested in them will contribute much toward maintaining public confidence in its solvency. The most that can be said against it is that it will involve some reduction in the bank's profits; but that is more than compensated by the additional security which it furnishes to both stockholders and depositors.

Again, Mr. President, we can not ignore the fact that it will add something to the value of every bond which is accorded the privilege of this law; because they will at once become clothed with a new and a valuable faculty. I have therefore believed that it was our duty to limit this increase in value to such securities as represent the public credit, and thus insure the benefit of this increase in value, as to future issues at least, to the great body of the people. If we only include public securities the people will reap the advantage either in the way of the higher price which they will receive for their bonds or else in the lower rate of interest which they must pay on them. This saving in the long flight of years will not be an inconsiderable one; but whether it may be great or small, it fairly belongs to the taxpayers, and it ought in justice to be reserved to them.

GOVERNMENT MONEY AGAINST BANK MONEY.

Mr. President, the divergence of views between the majority and the minority of the committee began with respect to railroad bonds. That, however, may be considered a matter of mere policy, not involving any governmental principle; and if it were the only difference between us, I might be willing to support their bill, notwithstanding I would seriously object to that particular provision of it. But, sir, there is another difference between the majority and the minority, which is incomparably more important than any question of security, and which, to my mind, involves a fundamental principle of this Republic. I allude, of course, to the question as to whether these emergency notes shall be issued by the banks or by the Government. The majority will not agree for the Government to issue them, and the minority can not agree for the banks to issue them. This is a question which has been debated many times in our history, but it has not always been correctly decided after each debate. We have amongst us a large number of very influential men who believe that the banks, and not the Government, should issue and control our currency. Indeed, sir, we sometimes hear them say in the Senate, and we frequently hear of them saying elsewhere, that the Government ought to go out of the banking business; and they mean by this that Congress ought to retire all United States notes and turn our entire paper circulation over to the banks. That the Government of the United States ought not to engage in the banking business I am more than ready to admit; but I utterly deny that the issuance of notes, impressed with the legal tender quality, made receivable for public dues, and intended to circulate as money, is any proper function of a bank. It is as much the duty of the Government to issue the notes which are to be received and treated as money as it is to coin the money which is made out of the precious metals; and even the men who favor a bank currency will not contend for a corporation-issued coin. They concede that it is the proper duty of the Government to own and to operate the mints at which our metallic money is coined; but they are under the strange delusion that a wholly different rule should apply to our paper money.

They seem to forget, Mr. President, that the right of the Government to issue currency is, according to some of the highest authorities, derived from the power conferred by the Constitution on Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof. That was the opinion of Mr. Webster, as stated by him on the floor of the Senate in a speech which he delivered on the 25th of May, 1832. In discussing the right of banks chartered by a State to issue paper money Mr. Webster declared:

> The exclusive power of regulating the metallic currency of the country would seem necessarily to imply or more properly to include as a part of itself a power to decide how far that currency should be exclusive, how far any substitute should interfere with it, and what that substitute should be.

Again in his speech on May 28, still discussing the same question, Mr. Webster said:

> I observed, the other day, that, in my opinion, it was very difficult to maintain on the face of the Constitution itself, and independent of long-continued practice, the doctrine that the States could authorize the circulation of bank paper at all. They can not coin money; can they then coin that which becomes the actual and almost the universal substitute for money? Is not the right of issuing paper, intended for circulation, in the place and as the representative of metallic currency, derived merely from the power of coining and regulating that metallic currency? As bringing this matter to a just test, let me ask whether Congress, if it had not the power of coining money, and of regulating the value of foreign coins, could create a bank, with the power to circulate bills?

If it be true, as declared by Mr. Webster, that Congress derives its power to issue paper money from its power to coin metallic money, then the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] must doubt the correctness of his very emphatic declaration that the issuing of paper money is a banking and not a governmental function. If the Senator requires any more than Mr. Webster's opinion to convince him of his error, he will find that Mr. Justice Story, next to Webster the most distinguished lawyer Massachusetts has ever given to the bench and bar of this country, has quoted this last statement of Mr. Webster with approval in his Commentaries on the Constitution. Not only does Mr. Webster make the power to issue currency depend on the power to coin money, but he distinctly negatives the view that the issue of currency is a necessary function of a bank. In this same debate he declared:

> The power of issuing notes for circulation is not an indispensable ingredient in the constitution of a bank, merely as a bank. The earlier banks did not possess it, and many good ones have existed without it.

If Mr. Webster were speaking to-day he could add to what he then said the statement that more than one-half of our banks do not now issue notes, and are disabled from doing so by a law of Congress.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I find myself in general agreement with the Senator from Texas on the power of Congress to regulate currency, and I have two citations from Mr. Webster which he has not read, which I should be glad to have read, because I think they cover the case a little more clearly than those he has cited.

Mr. BAILEY. They may cover it a little differently, but not more clearly. However, I shall be glad to hear them.

The Secretary read as follows:

> "In the next place, I hold that the regulation of the currency, whether metallic or paper—that a just and safe supervision over that which virtually performs the office of money, and constitutes the medium of exchange, whatever it may be—necessarily pertains to government; that it is one of the necessary and indispensable prerogatives of government." (Daniel Webster, speech in Wall street, September 28, 1840.)

Mr. BAILEY. It is a great pity that that doctrine is not popular in Wall street now.

The Secretary read as follows:

> "Hence it is true that, in the absence of all Government control and supervision, the wisdom and discretion regulating the amount of money afloat at any time in the community are but the aggregate of the wisdom and discretion of all the banks collectively considered; each individual bank acting from the promptings of its own interest, without concert with others, and not from any sense of public duty. In my judgment, such a regulator, or such a mode of regulating the currency, and of deciding what shall be the amount of money at any time existing in the community, is unsafe and untrustworthy, and is one to which we never can look to guard us against those excessive expansions and contractions which have produced such injurious consequences. Hence arises my view of the duty of the Government to take the care and control of the issues of these local institutions, and thereby to guard the community against the evils of an excessive circulation." (Daniel Webster, speech in Wall street, September 28, 1840.)

Mr. BAILEY. Much more can be found in Mr. Webster's speeches to the same effect, and instead of being at war with what I have been saying it really confirms my views; and I now see the purpose of the Senator from Rhode Island. He is making a side argument against an asset currency.

But, Mr. President, we are not left to political speeches in Congress, even though they have been approved by commentators on the Constitution, for light on this subject. It has been discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States on more than one occasion, and in almost every case the right to issue paper money has been referred, more or less directly, by that great tribunal to the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. In the case of the Veazie Bank v. Fenno the court employs this language:

> It can not be doubted that under the Constitution the power to provide a circulation of coin is given to Congress. And it is settled by the uniform practice of the Government and by repeated decisions, that Congress may constitutionally authorize the emission of bills of credit. It is not important here to decide whether the quality of legal tender, in payment of debts, can be constitutionally imparted to these bills; it is enough to say, that there can be no question of the power of the Government to emit them; to make them receivable in payment of debts to itself; to fit them for use by those who see fit to use them in all the transactions of commerce; to provide for their redemption; to make them a currency, uniform in value and description, and convenient and useful for circulation.

It is, of course, not necessary to remind those who are familiar with our history that this case was decided before the constitutionality of the legal-tender act had been passed upon by the court.

In the case of Hepburn v. Griswold, which is the first of the legal-tender decisions, and which declared the legal-tender law unconstitutional and void, in so far as it authorized the payment in United States notes of debts previously contracted, the opinion pronouncing that judgment declared:

> It is not doubted that the power to establish a standard of value by which all other values may be measured, or, in other words, to determine what shall be lawful money and a legal tender, is in its nature, and of necessity, a governmental power. It is in all countries exercised by the government.

It is very true that the court then denied that Congress could make any note a legal tender in payment of previously contracted debts under its power to coin money and regulate its value. But their reasoning in that case sustains my argument in this debate. They said that the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof confers only a power to make coin a legal tender, and that only what can be made a legal tender is embraced within the power conferred by the Constitution. I grant you this; but you must then grant me that when that court afterwards overruled its decision in the case of Hepburn v. Griswold and decided that Congress can make the notes of the United States a legal tender in the payment of debts, the reasoning of the court in the former case runs exactly parallel with my reasoning now. In other words, the court then said that the power to coin and issue money embraced only such as could be made a legal tender; and I now say that it having been decided that the United States notes can be made a legal tender, the power to issue them must be referred, under the reasoning in Hepburn v. Griswold, to the coinage clause of the Constitution.

Again, sir, in the legal-tender cases, which are reported in Twelfth Wallace, the court, speaking of this same power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, declares:

It was for this reason the power to coin money and regulate its value was conferred upon the Federal Government, while the same power, as well as the power to emit bills of credit, was withdrawn from the States. The States can no longer declare what shall be money, or regulate its value. Whatever power there is over the currency is vested in Congress.

It would be a curious and imperfect logic that would lead us to conclude that it is the function of a Government to declare what shall be money and then deny the right of the Government to issue it.

The most superficial knowledge of the nature and office of currency will make it plain that the issue of it is a function of the Government rather than the function of a bank. The whole reason and justification for the issue of any currency is that the supply of coin is not sufficient for the business of the country, and currency is issued to supplement it, thus in effect increasing the quantity of coin. If all of our currency were retired, and our people were compelled to conduct all transactions with coin as their only money, a most destructive revulsion would immediately ensue and a hopeless bankruptcy would overtake our most prosperous enterprises. Of course after a period of liquidation the volume of business would be readjusted to the volume of money; but our commercial, agricultural, and industrial progress would be painful and slow; and it is a knowledge of this fact which compels all men of all parties to favor the issuance of currency to supplement our supply of coin. In theory, of course, currency is not money, but is only a promise to pay money. In practice, however, it is money, and performs, when impressed with the legal-tender quality, every function of money within our own country. Not only is it spoken of as money, received as money, and treated as money in every respect by the people generally, but our law has long since adopted this common understanding, and our statutes now speak of it as money. We have gone so far as to distinguish between the currency which is "lawful money" and that which is not. We describe that which is a legal tender as "lawful money," thus asserting, at least by implication, that the present bank note, which is only a limited legal tender, is money, though not "lawful money." I am quite willing for individuals and corporations to issue their promissory notes, but I am not willing that either individuals or corporations shall issue "money," for only the Government ought to exercise that power; and gentlemen who talk so freely about taking the Government out of the banking business ought to be just as willing to take the banks out of the Government's business. I will cheerfully join them in doing the one, if they will join me in doing the other. My rule in this and in all other matters is that we shall not permit the Government to engage in the business of individuals or corporations nor permit individuals and corporations to engage in the business of the Government.

ISSUING CURRENCY NOT A BANK FUNCTION.

I can not account for the general but unfounded notion that the issue of currency is the function of a bank except upon the theory that so many governments have abdicated that sovereign power and have permitted banks to exercise it so long that men have come to believe that it is, and has always been, a banking privilege. Nothing, sir, could be further from the truth than this. The right to coin metallic and to issue paper money has been considered a sovereign right since the beginning of time, and the highest court in this Republic has sustained the constitutionality of the law under which our United States notes were issued, upon the ground that the right to issue them is a sovereign power. Perhaps, Mr. President, it would be well to recall to the Senate and to the country the language of the court in one of the Legal-Tender cases.

It appears to us to follow, as a logical and necessary consequence, that Congress has the power to issue the obligations of the United States in such form and to impress upon them such qualities as currency for the purchase of merchandise and the payment of debts as accord with the usage of sovereign governments. The power, as incident to the power of borrowing money and issuing bills or notes of the Government for money borrowed, of impressing upon those bills or notes the quality of being a legal tender for the payment of private debts was a power universally understood to belong to sovereignty, in Europe and America, at the time of the framing and adoption of the Constitution of the United States. The governments of Europe, acting through the monarch or the legislature, according to the distribution of powers under their respective constitutions, had and have as sovereign a power of issuing paper money as of stamping coin. This power has been distinctly recognized in an important modern case, ably argued and fully considered, in which the Emperor of Austria, as King of Hungary, obtained from the English court of chancery an injunction against the issue in England, without his license, of notes purporting to be public paper money of Hungary. (Austria v. Day, 2 Giff., 628, and 3 D. F. & J., 217.) The power of issuing bills of credit and making them, at the discretion of the legislature, a tender in payment of private debts had long been exercised in this country by the several colonies and States; and during the Revolutionary war the States, upon the recommendation of the Congress of the Confederation, had made the bills issued by Congress a legal tender. (See Craig v. Missouri, 4 Pet., 435, 453; Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet., 257, 313, 334–336; Legal Tender cases, 12 Wall., 557, 558, 622; Phillips on American Paper Currency, passim.) The exercise of this power not being prohibited to Congress by the Constitution, it is included in the power expressly granted to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

This position is fortified by the fact that Congress is vested with the exclusive exercise of the analogous power of coining money and regulating the value of domestic and foreign coin, and also with the paramount power of regulating foreign and interstate commerce. Under the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to issue circulating notes for the money borrowed, its power to define the quality and force of those notes as currency is as broad as the like power over a metallic currency under the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. Under the two powers, taken together, Congress is authorized to establish a national currency, either in coin or in paper, and to make that currency lawful money for all purposes, as regards the National Government or private individual. (U. S. Rep., vol. 110, p. 447.)

The controverted question in that case was, as every Senator knows, whether the Government had the power to make its own notes a legal tender in the payment of debts; but there was absolutely no division in the court or throughout the country as to the power of the Government to issue its notes without imparting to them the legal-tender quality. Even the first question has disappeared from our political discussions, as well as from our judicial tribunals, and it is now universally accepted as the settled law of the land that Congress can make the notes of the United States a legal tender in the payment of all debts. But, sir, I have not read this extract for the purpose of raising or deciding that question, because it is not necessary to the purpose which I have in hand, and I have read it only to show that the right to issue notes intended to circulate as money has from time out of mind, both in this country and in the Old World, been recognized as a sovereign power.

If there ever was a time in our history when the issuance of currency might have been considered the proper function of a bank, it was when bank notes did not possess the legal-tender quality in any degree and when they were mere promises to pay, whose value depended upon the solvency of the promisor. We have, however, passed beyond that time, and under legislation enacted by the Republican party the bank notes of to-day are treated as money in almost every respect, and are made a legal tender in the payment of many debts. It is true that the law has not yet gone to the extent of making them a legal tender as between man and man, but it has made them a legal tender to the Government for all dues except import duties, and from the Government for every obligation "except interest on the public debt and in redemption of the national currency." The Government of the United States can to-day condemn the homestead of any citizen and discharge the judgment rendered in the condemnation suit with the notes of a national bank. I repudiate the doctrine that any man in this Republic should be compelled to accept the promissory note of any corporation in satisfaction of his personal or his property rights.

These gentlemen who talk so freely about the issuance of currency being a function of banks and not of the Government are afflicted with short memories. They have forgotten that Congress passed a law levying a tax of 10 per cent upon the notes of State banks, and no Senator of the majority would now vote to repeal that law. Its wisdom was questioned when it was passed, and its constitutionality was afterwards assailed in the courts; but in the case of the Veazie Bank v. Fenno, the Supreme Court of the United States sustained its validity and placed its decision expressly upon the ground that Congress had a constitutional right to supply the country with its currency. Surely, even the most liberal construction of the Constitution would not give to the Government of the United States the power to destroy the notes of State banks because they might interfere with or compete against the notes of national banks, if the issuance of notes is purely a function of the banks and not of the Government. If it is the right of these banks and not of the Government to issue currency, then, sir, the notes of State banks and the notes of national banks should have been left to their own struggle for supremacy, and it was only because it was the right of the General Government itself to provide our currency that the 10 per cent tax on the issue of State banks was ever sustained by the courts. I grant you that the Federal Government, having the right to provide a currency and resting under a duty which corresponds to the right, may employ any instrumentality which seems to it an appropriate means to that end, and it may use the national banks for that purpose; but it still remains true that to provide our currency is the right and duty of the Government, and not the right or the duty of the banks. I do not doubt that Congress could lease our mints to mining corporations and authorize them to coin our metallic money, but such a law would confer upon those corporations a right which even the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. LODGE) will not deny belongs to the Government, and ought to be exercised by it.

Not only, Mr. President, does the power to coin and issue money belong to the Government, but it is wise that such should be the case. Considering the tremendous consequences to all the people, and remembering that its effect reaches into every home and determines the profits of every business, the currency of a free country ought forever to be kept under the absolute control of the Government. Those who advocate bank money and those who advocate Government money both agree that the price of almost every product and the prosperity of all classes are sensibly affected by the currency; and it is, to my mind, an amazing proposition that this power, second only to the power of taxation, shall be committed to men whose private interest might be wholly at war with the public welfare. It will not do to tell me that the bankers are high-minded and patriotic men and that they will not abuse this mighty power. Even, sir, if I knew they would not abuse it, I would still contend that they ought not to possess it. The history of the country, however, clearly establishes that they have abused that power in the past, and I am, therefore, constrained to fear that they will abuse it in the future. Until the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] declared in his speech a few days ago that several national banks had bought and deposited bonds with the Comptroller of the Currency without having taken out a dollar of circulation I had supposed that the whole cause of complaint against national banks, with reference to their issue, was that they had not taken out the full circulation which the law permitted; and I was surprised to find that some of them were so much opposed to an increase in the currency that they had deposited their bonds, but had refused to take out the notes which under the law they were entitled to receive. Without intending to impute bad faith or malfeasance in office to the Comptroller of the Currency, I venture to say that under the law no national bank has a right to begin its business until it has first taken out a circulation equal at least to 25 per cent of its capital stock.

It may be true that in the beginning the object of the national-bank act was to enlarge the market for our bonds, and that the requirement on every association to invest a part of its capital in those bonds was prompted by a desire to sustain their price. It may be that the right to issue circulating notes at that time was looked upon more in the light of a privilege than of an obligation, but through all the subsequent amendments to that law it is absolutely certain that nobody has supposed it necessary to require the banks to purchase our bonds in order to enhance their value; and the present purpose is to require them to provide a circulation rather than to furnish the Government a market for its bonds. But, Mr. President, whether, as a matter of law, these banks are required to take out a circulation and thus add to the volume of our currency is not material for me to inquire in this connection and I cite their refusal to issue any circulation at all as a conclusive proof that we can not depend upon them to supply the country with an adequate currency. Banks deal in money, and bankers are subject to the same infirmities of human nature as other men. It is as natural as the law of gravitation that every man who deals in a commodity prefers to see that commodity scarce and therefore high. The bankers know that it is with money as it is with everything else in this world—the less of it there is, the demand remaining the same, the more it will be worth; and they but obey a natural impulse when they seek to increase the value of that in which they deal by limiting its supply.

If any evidence were needed to show us the danger of committing the control over our volume of currency to banks, recent events will furnish it. Last autumn, when the country was in the very throes of a money famine, the national banks did not come to the rescue with cheerful and patriotic alacrity, but on the contrary, sir, the Secretary of the Treasury was compelled to beg them, almost upon bended knees, to take out additional notes. If the newspaper reports can be credited, he made a most frantic appeal to the national banks to come to the country's relief by increasing their issue of notes. He did not wait the tedious course of the mails; he did not even trust the swift and electric current of the telegraph, but it is said that he called the bankers over the telephone and implored them to help him relieve the pressure by increasing their circulation. There was but a tardy and a grudging response to his entreaties, for the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury show that even under his persuasion and the threat of a great financial disaster bank notes were increased less than $100,000,000, while the banks themselves were illegally using more than $250,000,000 of currency substitutes. They preferred the clearing-house certificates, because it was less expensive to obtain them and easier to retire them. As an American citizen I suffered a sense of deep humiliation to see the officers of this great Government begging the officers of national banking corporations to perform a duty which the Government itself ought never to have surrendered—the duty of providing the people of this country with an adequate supply of currency.

I entertain no prejudice against banks, and I know their immense value to our people in every business relation. As places where men who have money which they do not want to use can deposit it so that men who want to use money which they do not have can borrow it, they are as essential to our progress and prosperity as stores and factories. If banks were abolished, and we were compelled again to borrow the money which we need from individuals, we would not only be subjected to a great inconvenience, but we would be forced to pay a much higher rate of interest. They furnish us our exchange at a very moderate charge, and they greatly facilitate every business transaction. But, Mr. President, allowing the banks the full credit to which they are entitled, it does not follow that because they have been our useful servants in some things we should make them our masters in the most important of all things. As places of discount and of deposit I would encourage them by just and equal laws; but I would not clothe them with the power which only the Government itself can be trusted to wisely exercise.

Occasionally we hear some man assert that the bankers alone understand and are competent to regulate the finances of the country. That our bankers are prudent and sagacious citizens is generally true, and their advice is sought and followed in the private affairs of nearly all men who patronize their banks; but if they can safely keep the money which their stockholders invest with them and which their customers deposit with them, they will have done their full duty and will have earned the respect of all fair-minded men. If they do these things well, they should be free from the labor and the anxiety of regulating our financial system; and they will fully acquit themselves if they take honest care of the money after Congress has issued it. If we should yield to this false claim that the issue of currency is not a function of the Government and commit to the banks the regulation of the whole subject, the smaller bankers, although they might possess the larger intellect, would have little or no voice in the matter. A few great bankers, more through the power of their capital than by virtue of their intellect or knowledge, would soon acquire such an ascendency as would make any system their system rather than the system of all the banks.

Mr. President, it is rather a singular fact in the history of the world that many of the men who have accomplished most for the finances of nations have accomplished nothing for themselves in a financial way. Alexander Hamilton was our first, and it is claimed by many our greatest, Secretary of the Treasury. His genius and his skill in argument established our first national bank, and yet he died insolvent. Webster said of him that "he smote the rock of the national resources, and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth. He touched the dead corpse of public credit, and it sprung upon its feet;" but he did not lay aside even a modest competence for his old age. Robert Morris, who, more than any other man, may be said to have financed the American Revolution, lost his fortune in reckless speculation, and died a bankrupt. The Scotchman who drew the plan according to which the Bank of England was established passed the latter part of his life in poverty, and died neglected alike by his country and by his countrymen. His career is one of the romances of financial history. Macaulay says he was "gifted by nature with fertile invention, an ardent temperament, and great powers of persuasion." He traveled much, and there is no little dispute as to the errands upon which he traveled. Some say that he went to the West Indies as a missionary, while others declare that he went there as a buccaneer. But whether we accept the charitable or the uncharitable view of his character, nobody denies that his brain evolved the plan upon which the Bank of England was founded; and yet, sir, his name disappeared from the directory of that institution at the close of its first year's business. It will not do, Mr. President, to conclude that a good banker is necessarily a great financier; or that a great financier is necessarily a good banker. Accumulating money is one thing, and making laws under which all men shall have a fair and equal chance to accumulate money is quite a different thing. It would be just as wise for us to authorize our manufacturers to draw our tariff bills as it would be to authorize our bankers to formulate our banking laws. They may be honest, and in most cases they are men of the highest probity; but they see things from their point of view, and it is so natural for the most patriotic of us to think that whatever is best for us must be best for all the people.

UNITED STATES NOTES.

Mr. President, I must not leave this branch of the subject without some reply to those who have criticised my substitute as the recrudescence of greenbackism. If they mean by this to describe the notes which I have proposed to issue, then the criticism is just; but it is not important. I have made the notes to be issued under it uniform in all respects with the United States notes now outstanding, and they are commonly called greenbacks; but I can not comprehend the hostility which some men seem to cherish against those notes. If my mind were narrow enough to be influenced by an ungenerous sentiment, I might, as the son of a Confederate soldier, object to them because they were one of the instrumentalities with which the Union sustained itself during that unhappy war between the States. But, sir, I have no feeling of that kind left in my heart, and I do not consider it a valid objection to those notes now that they helped to preserve the Union in its most trying hour. If I can look upon them without disfavor, how much less should men of the North despise them? They equipped the mightiest army that any nation ever sent afield; and they served a purpose which ought to forever consecrate them in the eyes of those who fought and prayed for the success of the Union arms.

I desire to lay before the Senate a statement of the conditions which existed when those notes were issued and of the incalculable service which they rendered to the Government. This, sir, is not the wild declamation of some shallow demagogue seeking to win some public office by appealing to popular prejudice; nor is it the outburst of some impassioned orator whose imagination had been inflamed by a contemplation of the struggles, the sacrifices, and the triumphs of that time. It is the statement of a grave and learned justice, speaking for the highest judicial tribunal in the world; and this is what he said:

> We do not propose to dilate at length upon the circumstances in which the country was placed, when Congress attempted to make Treasury notes a legal tender. They are of too recent occurrence to justify enlarged description. Suffice it to say that a civil war was then raging which seriously threatened the overthrow of the Government and the destruction of the Constitution itself. It demanded the equipment and support of large armies and navies, and the employment of money to an extent beyond the capacity of all ordinary sources of supply. Meanwhile the Public Treasury was nearly empty, and the credit of the Government, if not stretched to its utmost tension, had become nearly exhausted. Moneyed institutions had advanced largely of their means, and more could not be expected of them. They had been compelled to suspend specie payments. Taxation was inadequate to pay even the interest on the debt already incurred, and it was impossible to await the income of additional taxes. The necessity was immediate and pressing. The Army was unpaid. There was then due to the soldiers in the field nearly a score of millions of dollars. The requisitions from the War and Navy Departments for supplies exceeded fifty millions, and the current expenditure was over one million per day. The entire amount of coin in the country, including that in private hands, as well as that in banking institutions, was insufficient to supply the needs of the Government three months, had it all been poured into the Treasury. Foreign credit we had none. We say nothing of the overhanging paralysis of trade, and of business generally, which threatened loss of confidence in the ability of the Government to maintain its continued existence, and therewith the complete destruction of all remaining national credit.
> It was at such a time and in such circumstances that Congress was called upon to devise means for maintaining the Army and Navy, for securing the large supplies of money needed, and, indeed, for the preservation of the Government created by the Constitution. It was at such a time and in such an emergency that the legal-tender acts were passed. Now, if it were certain that nothing else would have supplied the absolute necessities of the Treasury, that nothing else would have enabled the Government to maintain its armies and Navy, that nothing else would have saved the Government and the Constitution from destruction, while the legal-tender acts would, could anyone be bold enough to assert that Congress transgressed its powers? Or if the enactments did work these results, can it be maintained now that they were not for a legitimate end, or "appropriate and adapted to that end," in the language of Chief Justice Marshall? That they did work such results is not to be doubted. (12 Wallace, 540 and 541.)

But our friends who seek to retire and cancel these notes tell us that they depreciated at one time until they were worth less than 40 cents on the dollar. That is true; but it does not tend to prove they would depreciate now, or that they did depreciate then, except as any other evidence of the Government's indebtedness would have depreciated. In the first place, Mr. President, those notes were not receivable in payment of import duties, and many gentlemen contend that this fact was responsible for their depreciation. I can not subscribe entirely to that opinion, because they were receivable in payment of all other dues to the Government; and those other dues largely exceeded our import duties. I can not bring myself to believe that their nonreceivability for the smaller amount of custom dues would have reduced their current value to less than 40 per cent of their par value, while they were still receivable in the payment of other dues which were equal to more than twice the sum collected through customhouses. I do not mean to say that their exclusion from customs receipts did not reduce their value, because I am perfectly sure that it did; but I am equally sure that this single exception was not responsible for their entire depreciation. There was another and a better reason, and it is found in the fact that while they were promises to pay, there was no time when, or place where, or substance in which, the Government had bound itself specifically to redeem them. They were such indefinite promises that something was necessarily subtracted from their value.

It does not require any deep study to convince us that the value of a promise depends much upon the time, place, and manner of its redemption. We all recognize that fact in the case of an individual promise. If the Senator from Rhode Island, who has charge of this bill, were to execute his note promising that on demand he would pay to the bearer of it $1,000 in gold coin at the Riggs National Bank, of this city, it would be accepted by anybody who knows his financial standing at 100 cents on the dollar; but if he were to issue his note promising that whenever he pleased and wherever he pleased, and with any substance he might see fit to use he would pay to the bearer of that note $1,000, nobody would take it, even at the most liberal discount. While the note of the Government did not read upon its face as I have described the note of the Senator from Rhode Island, it was still true and within the knowledge of all men that no time or place had been fixed for its redemption, and as its legal-tender quality was a new departure in our governmental policy, many men were uncertain whether it would ever be redeemed in coin. But notwithstanding these disadvantages, Mr. President, this note of the United States, which is now so much decried, was received everywhere as equal in value to the Government's other promises.

How different is the note which we now propose to issue from the note which was issued during the war. The present note is one that will be received in payment of all dues to the Government; the present note is one that contains a definite promise that upon the presentation of it to the proper officers of the Government it will be redeemed in coin, and, of course, under the existing law that means gold coin, because gold is now our only money of ultimate redemption. Thus, Mr. President, this promise is definite as to time, place, and substance. Not only so, but the Government of the United States is not now struggling for its very existence. Its future is not shadowed by the lowering clouds of war, and its credit is high in every market of the world. Its noninterest-bearing promise is worth one hundred cents on the dollar in every community under our jurisdiction, and no intelligent citizen fears that it will soon be worth any less. It is, therefore, the sheerest nonsense for men to say that our promise issued under these circumstances will depreciate, because a promise issued under very different circumstances did depreciate. Do not, sir, understand me to mean that the Government can issue notes without limit and still maintain their value. I know better than that; and I know that with the Government, as with the citizen, its promises to pay can only be kept at par when issued with a due regard to its ability to redeem them. I do not, however, hesitate one moment to declare that this Government could easily carry a paper circulation at this time of $2,500,000,000 without the slightest strain upon its credit and without the slightest danger of its depreciation.

SUBSTITUTE NOT GREENBACKISM.

But, Mr. President, if the men who assail my substitute as an effort to revive greenbackism mean that it is drawn in accordance with the doctrine of the old Greenback party, they either have not read it or else they are grossly ignorant of the history and teaching of the Greenback leaders. The contention of those men was that the Government should stamp upon a piece of worthless paper the declaration that it was a dollar and that every man subject to our authority should be compelled to receive it as such. The best brain and courage of the Democratic party combated that pernicious fallacy until it was finally abandoned by many of its most earnest and intelligent advocates; but during that campaign thoughtful Democrats everywhere recognized the imperative need of a currency to supplement our coin, and we pledged ourselves to provide that supplemental currency precisely as I have done in this substitute. We promised then, and we propose now, that every note issued by the Government shall contain its promise to pay, and that every promise shall be redeemed on demand and in the coin of the country. It is not greenbackism for the United States to issue its notes containing its solemn promise to pay. That, sir, is Democracy, and it is the Democracy of the elder and the better days.

The greatest of all Democrats was an advocate of a Government currency and opposed to bank notes. He demanded that bank paper should be suppressed and the circulation restored to the nation to which it belongs; and Mr. Jefferson was not more insistent upon this policy than his greatest disciples and successors have been. The struggle between Andrew Jackson and the old national bank is too well known to need any recital here, nor do I need to relate that another, and intellectually a greater Democrat than Jackson, was earnest in his advocacy of a Government currency, and in his opposition to bank notes. Without intending any invidious comparison I can safely say that no man of his generation—and I do not forget that he lived in the days of Daniel Webster and Henry Clay—ever studied and understood the currency question more thoroughly than John C. Calhoun. He devised the best system ever proposed up to his time, and some profound students think that a better one has never since then been suggested. He proposed a perfectly automatic arrangement, and it would have worked out in practical operation just as he calculated. Mr. Calhoun fully understood that currency could and might be overissued, and he therefore incorporated into his plan an absolutely certain corrective of that abuse. His proposition was for the Government to issue a paper not redeemable in coin, but receivable in public dues. He did not contemplate that such paper should be made a legal tender, and, indeed, it was not then supposed that the Government could make any note a legal tender in the payment of debts; but he believed that the United States could easily maintain such a circulation as he proposed equal to twice its annual revenue. He fully explained, however, that if such a currency was ever overissued it would immediately depreciate, and that when depreciated nobody would accept it from the Government; but everybody would use it in making their payments to the Government because they could purchase it at a discount. Under that condition this paper would flow back into the Treasury, and none of it would flow out until the entire excess was drawn from the channels of trade, and the equilibrium completely restored.

I could add to these names of Jefferson, Jackson, and Calhoun the names of many other illustrious Democrats, but it would be a waste of time to do so. The position of the Democratic party to-day is precisely the same as it has always been upon this question. It is standing now as it has stood so many times in our history, between two great and dangerous extremes. On the one side stands a party—the true successor of the old greenback organization—demanding an unlimited issue of irredeemable paper money; and on the other side stands the Republican party demanding that the banks shall issue our currency and that the Government shall guarantee its redemption. Between these two, the Democratic party stands, resolutely demanding that the Government shall exercise the sovereign right of issuing our currency, but solemnly promising that every note which is issued shall be redeemed in coin upon the demand of its holder.

The men who cry out so vociferously against the issue of notes by the Government are the very ones who are always advocating the issuance of notes by the banks. Independently of any question as to whether it is the duty of the Government to issue these notes directly or the right of the Government to devolve their issue upon the banks, the class of men to whom I am now referring seem to think that the Government notes are an unsafe currency, and that bank notes are the very perfection of a safe and a conservative circulation. I am not disposed to distrust the sincerity of my opponents, and I believe that men are generally honest with themselves and with their countrymen in forming and expressing their political opinions; but it taxes my charity to the utmost to believe in the sincerity of men who insist that a bank note is safer than the note of this Government. Do they not know that behind bank notes are merely the securities which they pledge and the assets which they may hold, while behind the note of the Government stands all which supports the credit of bank notes and also the other uncounted resources of the country? In other words, a Government note has behind it all that stands behind the bank notes with billions of property besides; and it is the merest drivel for men to talk about a bank circulation being safer than a Government currency.

The argument as to the safety of the two currencies is wholly apart from the other argument that a bank-note circulation can respond more readily to the public needs. I grant you that under the law as it now stands the banks can issue currency when the Goverment could not; but under the law as we are proposing to amend it the Government could put additional notes in circulation as rapidly, or even more rapidly, than the banks. Nor must it be forgotten, Mr. President, by those who prefer a bank circulation as more elastic that it is just as true that the banks can contract the currency more readily than the Government as it is that they can expand it more readily than the Government. There has been an infinite deal of nonsense spoken and written upon this currency question; but the worst of it all is this constant iteration in favor of an elastic currency. If by an elastic currency is meant some provision for these periodical disturbances, that is desirable and wise; but no greater curse could fall upon the land than the expansion and contraction of its currency with every season or every year. An elastic currency is one that expands to let the unwary in, and then contracts to squeeze them out. It is a currency under which speculation would flourish and industry would languish.

THE FEAR OF AN OVERISSUE.

The real objection on the part of all intelligent men to a Government currency grows out of their fear that under the pressure of political considerations it will be overissued. That was the argument which Hamilton employed with great effect in his famous report to Washington urging the establishment of a national bank. Addressing himself to this very proposition that the United States should issue its own notes, he said:

> The emitting of paper money by the authority of Government is wisely prohibited to the individual States by the national Constitution; and the spirit of that prohibition ought not to be disregarded by the Government of the United States. Though paper emissions, under a general authority, might have some advantages not applicable, and be free from some disadvantages which are applicable to the like emissions by the States separately, yet they are of a nature so liable to abuse, and, it may even be affirmed, so certain of being abused, that the wisdom of the Government will be shown in never trusting itself with the use of so seducing and dangerous an expedient.

It must be remembered that Alexander Hamilton had no confidence in the capacity of the people to govern themselves. He honestly believed that the further the Government could be removed from the people the more wisely and the more safely it would be administered; and it is not singular that a man who entertained such a view should distrust a Congress partly elected by a direct vote of the people. Hamilton not only believed that the banks should control the currency, but he also believed that the rich and powerful should control the Government. He seemed to think that the turbulence of the one would be more harmful than the selfishness of the other; but time and experience have shown his opinion upon both questions to be erroneous. None of his political descendants can now be found to repeat his argument in favor of a Senate for life or a government modeled after that of Great Britain; but they do not hestitate to repeat his argument upon this currency question, because it is not so generally understood. Whatever may have been the reason or the excuse for Mr. Hamilton's assertion that Congress would be certain to abuse the power of issuing notes, we now know that it was without any justification. Congress has always possessed the power to issue the notes of the Government and has exercised it on more than one occasion without ever abusing it. Currency disorders have heretofore resulted from an overissue by the banks, but never from an overissue by the Government. It will not do to say that those overissues were made by irresponsible State banks, because that does not meet the question. I am not discussing the merits of the bank notes of to-day as against the bank notes of another day. I am simply asserting what every well-informed man knows to be the truth—that notes have repeatedly been overissued by the banks but never by the Government. Not only had Congress authorized an issue of treasury notes prior to 1862, leaving them to circulate as mere promises to pay, but since 1862 it has assumed and exercised the power to impress upon the notes of the United States the quality of a legal tender, and since 1872, when that power was vindicated and sustained by a decision of the Supreme Court, it has been unchallenged. And yet, sir, in all this more than thirty-six years the legislation of Congress has been to unduly contract rather than to expand the currency.

With this history before us, he is indeed a rash man who says that Congress can not be trusted to exercise this great power. Moreover, sir, it is not now proposed that Congress shall be deprived of this power, because no act of ours could accomplish that. It is simply proposed that Congress shall abdicate the exercise of it while still retaining the full possession of it. If the fears of the Hamiltonian school of statesmanship are well founded, the country could not be saved from Congressional inflation simply by authorizing the banks to exercise this function of the Government: because Congress could at any time resume that power and exercise it, leaving the banks to continue their circulation or retiring it, as it might choose. If, therefore, the power is a dangerous one, it would be all the more dangerous if left to sleep instead of being exercised, because its disuse would engender an ignorance of the subject and prevent that caution in the exercise of this power which a knowledge of the question would always cultivate. But, Mr. President, even if we concede that there is some danger of an overissue, I do not believe that we ought to surrender a sovereign power of the Government because of an apprehension that it might be abused. If Congress can be trusted with the power of taxation which reaches into every home and can take from the mouth of labor the bread which it has earned; if Congress can be trusted to levy taxes which collect from every man his share in the Govermnent's support; if Congress can be trusted to enact our coinage laws and to regulate the value of our metallic money; if Congress can be trusted to adopt a criminal code affecting the lives and the liberties of our people, surely, sir, there can be no good reason for fearing that it will not act wisely in regulating the currency of the country.

METHOD OF DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. President, no doubt exists in my mind as to the wisdom of providing for an emergency; nor do I doubt that such a provision ought to be made by the issuance of United States notes. That far there is, and there can be, no serious difference of opinion on this side of the Chamber; but it has not been so easy to agree upon a method of putting this currency into circulation. I am convinced, however, that upon a full consideration of the subject it will be found impossible to devise a better plan than the one proposed in our substitute. Some gentlemen think that the Government ought to issue this money and lend it to anybody who can offer the security required; but with the most respectful deference to those who entertain it, I venture to say that such a view originates in a misconception of the duty which the Government owes to the people in this matter. The demand that the Government shall give every individual or corporation who offers the specified security the same right to receive these notes as is given to the banks, proceeds upon the theory that the Government is under some obligation to provide individuals or banks with the money which their business may require. The Government rests under no such obligation. Its duty—and its whole duty—is to supply the country at large with a currency sufficient in volume to transact its business; and it is for each individual and corporation to get, in his or in its own way, so much of that currency as they need and can honestly obtain.

It has been urged with some vehemence that to confine the deposit of this money to banks is class legislation; and the men who say this seem to think that the only way to exempt ourselves from this imputation is to allow every person, natural or corporate, who offers the security to obtain the money. But those who press that argument overlook the fact that it subjects them equally to the charge of class legislation; because under their proposition only those who have bonds could borrow the money; and it is practically certain that the men with these bonds to offer as security would have a less urgent need for the money than the other men who have no bonds. Instead of incorporating such a provision in my substitute, I have, after great deliberation, confined the deposit of this money to the banks, and I believe that the reasons which have influenced me to that course will satisfy any thoughtful man. If we issue these notes to everybody who offers the security, we not only confine the privilege to a class, but we confine its benefits to the same class; while if we deposit them in the banks, then every citizen who has good security, though not such as this substitute requires the banks to give, or whose good standing entitles him to a credit without security, can obtain them from the banks. If you say that I am thus compelling the people to borrow the Government's money from the banks, I answer that I am requiring the Government to deposit its money in the banks so that it will be available for general use. When a citizen deposits his money with the bank he does so for his own convenience and not for the benefit of the bank. So in this case I would deposit the public money in the bank for the public's convenience, and not for the benefit of the bank. If the Government needed to use a horse and vehicle it would send its agent to a livery stable to hire one, and it would not consider that it had discriminated against its other citizens by going to the place established for the accommodation of travelers. Many men in that community might be willing to hire their horses and vehicles, but the Government would deal with the man who had equipped himself for the business of supplying conveyances to those who travel. So, Mr. President, it seems to me that when the Government is to deposit money it ought to use the same agencies and instrumentalities which are generally used in every community, and through which the business of every man is transacted and facilitated.

If anybody supposes that this substitute is drawn in the interest of the banks, they have only to consider that practically every banker in the country is opposed to it. In the first place, the rate of interest is so high as to preclude the possibility of much profit on it; and the method of securing the notes will absorb what might otherwise be made. The banks realize this, and they have bitterly complained that the rate of interest and the security required will offer them no sufficient inducement to use this money. They are right in their statement; but they are wrong in complaining about it. They ought to be willing to render a service to the country in a great emergency without demanding a profit; and as a matter appealing to their own selfish interest, they must not forget that they are the chief sufferers in every panic. In such a time many of them fail, and the long list of suicides committed by their officers bears ample witness to the tremendous strain under which they labor. If, therefore, it be true—and undoubtedly it is true—that the banks will make little money out of this transaction, it is still true that they will render a valuable public service, and save all of them from great anxiety and many of them from ruinous losses.

Some worthy people believe that the security for these deposits ought to be enlarged so as to include our great staple products, and insist that this money shall be loaned directly to the farmers on their cotton when once stored in a warehouse and insured in favor of the Government. I do not dispute that cotton is as good a security as a bond, nor do I agree with those who think it is not easily convertible into money. States, counties, and municipalities sometimes default in their interest, and even the Federal Government itself once found its credit so impaired that its promises sold for less than 50 cents on the dollar; but, sir, no folly of men and no misfortune of war can seriously abate the world's demand for cotton. Men and women must buy and wear the beautiful and useful fabrics woven from it; and when accepted at a fair margin, I do not question that cotton would make the Government perfectly secure for its loan.

But, sir, suppose we admit that cotton is an ample security, and that the planter shall have the right to obtain a loan from the Treasury by depositing it in a warehouse to be designated by the Government. Will not the farmer of the West then have a right to demand the same accommodation upon his wheat as the planter of the South has obtained upon his cotton? Can not the wheat farmer say that he feeds us, and is therefore as much entitled to our consideration as the cotton planter who clothes us? After you have extended your loans to the cotton planter of the South and the wheat farmer of the West what will you say to the tobacco grower when he applies for a loan? You may tell him that his article is not a necessity; but he will answer that it is one of almost universal use, and therefore a perfectly good security. If you still deny him, he will tell you that he is engaged in a hand-to-hand combat with the tobacco trust, and he will appeal for a loan that will enable him to carry the product of his land and labor until he can sell it at a living price. When you have yielded, as you would, to the appeal of the tobacco grower, his neighbor who is engaged in raising hemp will come next, and he will tell you that nothing can save him from the greed of the cordage trust unless the Government will allow him to store his hemp and make him an advance against it.

Then, Mr. President, when you have accommodated the cotton planter, the wheat farmer, the tobacco grower, and the hemp raiser, you will next encounter the landowner, who will tell you that without his land neither cotton, nor wheat, nor tobacco, nor hemp could be grown. He will tell you—and he will speak the truth—that it is as true in the economic as it is in the physical world that everything rests upon the earth. He will tell you that the security which he offers is not subject, as cotton, wheat, tobacco, and hemp are, to a deterioration in quality or to a fluctuation in price; and he will demand his right to share with his fellow-citizens in the loans which the Government is making. Then the stockman comes with his horses, and he will tell you that without his horses to cultivate it, the land itself would yield neither cotton, nor wheat, nor tobacco, nor hemp. He will tell you that his horses not only produce the wealth of the American farm but help to exchange it after it has been produced. He will tell you that except for their patient strength, which draws these products from the farm to the market place, our crops would aggregate but a fraction of their present value and our commerce would relapse into a primitive system of barter between neighbors; and he will demand to know if this Government has a right, after extending these accommodations to the landowner and to those who cultivate the soil, to deny an equal privilege to the man who raises the animal with which the soil is made productive. After you have settled with the stockman who raises horses, you must next answer the stockman who raises cattle and hogs, and he will insist that the strength and health which his meat gives to those who toil in field, workshop, and factory entitles him to the same privilege which has been accorded to his brothers. Then comes the ironmaster, who will recite the development of his industry, and he will tell you how he and those whom he employs have taken from the bosom of the earth, where God's hand had planted it, this most marvelous agent of modern civilization. He will tell you how he has forged it into rails, so that every product of farm and factory may find a market in the remotest quarters of the globe. He will tell you how it has reduced all distances, tunneled the mountains, and spanned the rivers; and he will demand the same accommodation upon his iron ore that you have extended to other men upon their agricultural products and their live stock. Thus, Mr. President, man after man, and class after class will follow each other to Congress for a law, and afterwards to the Treasury for a loan until we have issued currency beyond all sensible proportion to our business, and have brought upon our beloved country a suffering infinitely worse than that which we are seeking to prevent.

OTHER PRACTICAL DIFFICULTIES.

There are other and very great practical difficulties in the way of such legislation. To begin with, this is an emergency currency, and consequently it ought to be put into circulation with as little delay as possible. The average citizen is only apprised of a stringency in the money market when he finds himself unable to obtain his usual accommodation at the bank; and it only becomes serious with him when he next finds himself unable to realize the money which he needs through a sale of his property. If the people were compelled to wait before dealing with the situation until men had tried to borrow at the bank, and having failed to sell their property, would apply to the Government for a loan, much of the mischief which this bill is intended to avoid would be done before it would be possible for the money to reach the channels of circulation. Even if you were to provide in this bill that anybody who applied and who offered the security should receive this money, it would still happen that those who knew first about the coming trouble would make the first application, and the supply of currency within a reasonable limit would be exhausted before the farmers and merchants could reach the Treasury.

But, Mr. President, even if the merchant and the farmer could reach the Treasury before the banker, and obtain this money, it would not help those who would stand in the greatest need of it. Nearly all merchants keep their entire capital actively employed in their mercantile business, and very few of them are able to invest any of their money in bonds bearing a low rate of interest. Therefore the only merchants who could avail themselves of such a provision in the law would be the richest and most prosperous ones, who would have the least need for it. Nor is the case different with the farmers. A large majority of our cotton planters, at least, require the full price of their crop to cover their expenses, and but few of them could afford to mortgage their cotton and lose the use of the difference between the price of it and the loan they could obtain on it. But even if that were not true, and if the farmers generally could afford to leave their equity for future use, it would be an exceedingly dangerous proceeding for them to pledge their cotton to the Government under any sensible law which could be framed; because if the price of cotton should fall, the Government would be compelled to call on them to either increase their security by bringing more cotton to the warehouse, or else make the margin good by paying a part of the debt. Only the more prosperous could comply with this demand; and the less prosperous ones would see their cotton sold to protect the Government on a declining market, and thus their equity would disappear. The Government could not indulge its debtors as the banks and local creditors do. If the note of a good man matures at the bank, and he is called on for its payment, he simply makes an explanation of his inability to pay at that time, and the greater his embarrassment, if he is honest and solvent, the more certain he is to secure an extension. It would not be so with the Government. When it calls for money due it, no excuses nor explanations will be accepted, and the amount must be paid without default or delay. Only institutions with ample security and with an ability to promptly meet every demand can afford to accept money from the Government under any law that a sane Congress could be induced to pass.

OTHER DIFFERENCES BETWEEN BILL AND SUBSTITUTE.

Mr. President, there are two other, and, as I believe, important differences between the bill and the substitute. One difference consists of a provision found in the bill and not in the substitute, while the other difference consists of a provision found in the substitute and not in the bill. A peculiar and, as I believe, a wholly indefensible provision of the bill is the section which repeals all limitation on the right of national banks to retire their ordinary circulation and leaves them free to work out a damaging contraction of the currency.

This bill, instead of repealing all limitation on the right of national banks to retire their ordinary circulation, ought to contain a provision still further limiting that right. The argument heretofore made in favor of permitting the banks to retire their notes was that they would thus be induced to provide a larger issue when the necessities of the country required more currency. It was contended—and there was much force in that contention—that if the banks were compelled to keep out, during an ordinary time, the currency which they had issued in an extraordinary time, they would be less inclined to take out additional notes when more currency was needed; and that argument prevailed upon Congress to permit the limited retirement of their notes. But, sir, if this bill becomes a law, national banks will not take out ordinary circulation to meet emergencies, and the argument which has heretofore been advanced in support of their right to retire their ordinary notes is irrelevant. In other words, the banks will hereafter meet emergencies by issuing notes under this bill and not under their general authority. Therefore their circulation under the general law not being an emergency circulation ought not to be retired at all; and certainly the banks ought not to be clothed with a power to retire them to an extent that might result in a sudden and disastrous contraction. Had the bill repealed the present law which permits the retirement of $0,000,000 per month and restored the old law, which only permitted the retirement of $3,000,000 per month, it would have been more in harmony with its general provisions.

The section which I have incorporated in the substitute, and which is not in the bill, amends the present law in relation to reserves. I am aware that some gentlemen with a thorough practical knowledge of the banking business do not think this a wise provision, and consider it entirely safe to let the law stand as it now exists. Upon the mere question of safety I would readily defer to their judgment, based, as it is, upon their personal experience; but looking at the question from a broader view I believe that the amendment which I have proposed is wise, and would be beneficial to the country. Many thoughtful men insist that the entire reserve ought to be held by the banks in their own vaults; but such a requirement would unnecessarily reduce the ability of the banks to accommodate their customers, because it would compel them to hold, in addition to their reserves, a further sum with their New York correspondents to serve the convenience of their patrons.

I recognize that the country banks must keep a certain amount of money in New York against which they can draw their bills of exchange; and I am perfectly willing that what is reasonably required for that purpose shall be counted as a part of their reserve. I think it will be found upon examination that no country bank has ever failed by reason of its inability to obtain the cash which it had with its New York correspondent, and I do not contend that under ordinary circumstances the solvency of our country banks is imperiled through their custom of depositing a large part of their reserves in the banks of New York. My objection to that practice goes beyond its effect upon particular banks, and comprehends its wider effect in stimulating the overuse of bank credits there. To prevent this, and still leave enough of the reserve to answer the purposes of exchange, my substitute requires that hereafter the banks shall keep two-thirds of their reserve in their own vaults, and can only keep one-third with their reserve agents. In my opinion this reduces, as far as possible, the accumulation of loanable funds in New York without depriving the interior banks of the right to use a part of their reserve to answer their exchange business.

THE ORIGIN OF THE RECENT STRINGENCY.

I have my own opinion, and it is a very definite one, as to what produced the recent financial stringency and brought us to the very verge of a disastrous panic; but I do not know that it would interest the Senate or the country for me to state the reasons upon which that opinion is based. I will, however, without entering upon an elaborate discussion of it, venture to say that it was due immediately, to the overuse of bank credits in the city of New York. It came when the country had the least reason to expect it. Our crops had been abundant, and the price of almost every farm product was more than satisfactory. A recent statement made by the Secretary of Agriculture shows that the products of American farms last year exceeded in value any previous year in our history. There had been neither war nor pestilence, the balance of trade was largely in our favor, and there was absolutely no question as to the value of our money. There had been no change of parties, threatening a revision of the tariff, which our Republican friends so often claim breeds distrust and produces industrial depression.

I do not, of course, overlook the fact that it has been charged in many quarters that the trouble was due to the persistent demand of the President of the United States for the enactment of new laws and the enforcement of old laws to regulate and control our railroads; but that charge has been made by men whose minds are heated with resentment, and it will not bear a close analysis. The President has demanded only that the railroads of this country should be required to deal justly with the people; and he has evinced no disposition to harass or to oppress them. I am no apologist for the President; and I have no patience with the adulation of him in which some Democrats indulge. It is true that upon this question of railroad regulation he has embraced the doctrine of our party, and for that I applaud him; but he has done more to change the character and the structure of this Government than all of his predecessors combined. He has frequently exhibited a supreme indifference to the Constitution of his country, and has pursued what has seemed to me a systematic and a deliberate purpose to impair the rights of the States, and to concentrate all power in the Federal Government. It was the boast of Augustus Cæsar that he found Rome of brick and left it of marble. President Roosevelt can hereafter say that he found this a union of sovereign States, and left it one vast nation. The good he has done in arousing public attention to certain evils of corporate management will give him an enviable place in the history of his time; but the harm he has done in dwarfing the States and exalting the General Government can not be measured, and unless the tendency which he has set in motion is arrested and reversed our splendid Federal system will ultimately be destroyed. We have never before witnessed such a mixture of good and evil in any public man. Before we have finished praising him for some wise recommendation he makes another so foolish that our praise must turn to censure. They tell me that he is brave, and I answer that he is just as rash as he is brave. They tell me that he is honest, and I answer that he is just as arbitrary as he is honest. He is—

> Too bad for a blessing,
> Too good for a curse,
> I wish in my heart
> He were better or worse.

If he were much better, he would be a Democrat; and if he were a little worse, he would not obscure and confuse the great issues between us and our adversaries.

But, sir, conceding that the President's attitude toward the corporations has affected the value of their securities, that would only embarrass the holders of those securities who had borrowed on them beyond a safe margin, and it would not disprove my assertion that the real cause of the trouble was the overuse of bank credits in the city of New York. I am not only confident that the trouble was attributable to the overuse of bank credits in New York; but I am equally confident that the overuse of bank credits there was largely due to the bad habit of the country banks in keeping so much money on deposit with New York banks. The inevitable effect of that practice is to create a plethora of loanable funds in that city, and this plethoric condition of the money market there invites improvident loans and leads to worse than improvident speculation. When money is sent to New York by the country banks, the New York banks pay interest on it at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, and they will not keep that money idle in their vaults, but will very naturally endeavor to make a profit on it by using it. They are thereby induced to lend it for what can not by any stretch of the imagination be called legitimate commercial purposes, thus increasing their loans until almost any kind of a financial shock produces a serious consequence to them and, through them, to the country at large.

Let me illustrate what I mean. Against every million dollars that the country banks have on deposit they must hold a reserve of $150,000. Of this $150,000 they must keep two-fifths, or $60,000, at home, and they may keep three-fifths, or $90,000, with their reserve agents. When this $90,000 is placed in New York the banks with which it is placed are only required to hold 25 per cent of it, or $22,500, as a reserve against it, and may lend the other $67,500. Thus three-fourths of that $90,000 is not kept as a reserve at all; but is loaned in the usual course of New York business. The sum of all this is that instead of having $150,000 as a reserve against every million dollars of their deposits the country banks really have 6 per cent at home and 2¼ per cent in New York, making an actual reserve of only 8¼ per cent. No man can believe that this is a safe or a conservative system of banking; and the practice of requiring a reserve of 15 per cent and then permitting three-fifths of that reserve to be loaned to other banks, which, in turn, lend three-fourths of it to their customers, is a patent and a dangerous subterfuge. It is plainly extending bank loans beyond the point of safety, and it is not surprising that a catastrophe overtakes this country whenever there is a demand for money which compels an extensive call of bank loans in New York.

In candor, Mr. President, it must be admitted that while the overuse of bank credits was greatest in New York, that was not the only place in which the same trouble existed. An examination of the incomplete bank statements will show that while New York was the chief it was not the only offender against conservative banking. In the speech which he delivered several days ago my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] contended that the recent panic was not produced by depositors taking their money out of the banks, and he supported that contention by showing that the bank deposits in June, 1907, were $880,000,000 greater than in June, 1906. These figures abundantly prove what he intended them to prove; but they also prove much more than that, and their gravest import to me is the irrefragable evidence which they furnish of excessive bank loans. The money in the United States on the 30th day of June, 1906, amounted to $3,069,000,000, and on June 30, 1907, $3,114,000,000, or an increase of $45,000,000. The amount of money held by all banks which reported their holdings in June, 1906, amounted to $1,010,000,000, while in June, 1907, these same banks held $1,106,000,000, making an increase of $96,000,000. Thus, while the stock of money in the country had increased only $45,000,000, the cash held by the reporting banks had increased $96,000,000, or more than double as much as the total increase in the stock of money. This would indicate a healthy condition and tend to dissipate any apprehension as to the business situation. But, sir, when we prosecute our inquiry a little further we find ample cause for just alarm.

The reports of these same banks show that while their cash on hand had increased only $96,000,000, their deposits had increased $880,000,000, and this increase in deposits represented almost entirely an increase of bank credits rather than the deposit of cash. It was brought about in this way: A customer would ask for a loan of $10,000; the bank would take his note for that amount, pass it into the bills receivable account, and place $10,000 to his credit. That $10,000 would then become a deposit and would be so counted in that bank's reports; but the dullest man can easily perceive that the bank was really increasing the amount of its deposits without receiving a dollar in cash; and what appeared as an increase in the bank's deposits was really nothing more than an increase in its credits. Nothing is more dangerous to the commercial peace of a country than the overuse of credit; and nothing more clearly establishes the overuse of bank credits than the increase of bank deposits unless they represent at least a safe proportion of actual cash. While the increase of bank deposits undoubtedly shows that there was no excuse for the panic so far as the conduct of depositors was concerned, it also shows that there was no escape from it whenever a contraction of bank credits became necessary. It will be found, Mr. President, by anybody who will examine the distribution of this $880,000,000 increase in deposits that banks in every part of the country were swelling their deposits by extending credits rather than by receiving cash.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Texas regarding that portion of his substitute which provides for an increase in the amount of bank reserves held by the banks in their vaults. I am absolutely in sympathy with the Senator's view upon that question; but I find myself met by this difficulty: The reports show that, outside of the savings banks and the trust companies, the bank loans of the country amounted to about $10,000,000,000 last year. Of that amount about one-half, or a little over one-half, was made by the State banks and a little less than one-half by the national banks. As against those bank loans and the corresponding amount, of course, of bank deposits the national banks had an actual reserve, on an average, of about 18 per cent whilst the State banks had an average of less than 8 per cent. The difficulty I meet with there is that if we increase the restrictions upon the national banks and can not in any way affect the State banks, whose reserves on the average, are, of course, absolutely inadequate, we will simply increase the disposition of the national banks to abandon the national organization and take up the State organization.

I would like to ask the Senator whether he thinks it within the power of Congress, under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution and regarding State banks which are engaged in interstate commerce in the same light that we do State railroads engaged in interstate commerce—whether we would have the right, in the interest of the public safety, just as we apply safety appliances to the State railroads, to require of the State banks the maintenance of the same reserve that is required of the national banks as a condition of their engaging in interstate commerce, or whether there is any other legislation that we could enact, either persuasive or compulsory, that would bring about a harmonious system upon the part of all the banks of the country as to the question of reserves that are so essential to the public safety?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the State banks of discount and deposit are beyond the reach of Congressional legislation, and are no more subject to the jurisdiction of the General Government than are the farms or the factories in our States.

I will say further, Mr. President, that, as for my part, I am not one of those who cry out always for uniformity. God Himself did not make all things alike, and I do not think wise legislators should attempt what the All-Wise Being did not think it worth His while to do. There is sometimes strength in diversity, and there is sometimes weakness in uniformity. I would prefer that the States of this Union should have a bad system, if it were their system, than to have a good system imposed upon them by the people of another State. So long as what they do relates to them and to their people only, it is for them and for their legislatures to decide. When they engage in a business that affects other States and other people, as would the issuance of currency, then they subject themselves to the jurisdiction of Congress; but so long as they conduct merely the business of receiving deposits and making loans, we have, and we ought to have, no power over them.

It may be true that the best we can do will leave something still to be done until the States have each made theirs a perfect system; but if we do our duty here, we stand acquitted to our conscience and our country, and we will leave State legislatures to answer to their constituents.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that if it be true—and it is true—that over one-half of the business of the country, interstate as well as State, is done by the State banks, then, if their system is defective, it lies in their power to involve in ruin interstate commerce throughout the entire country and to involve in destruction the national-bank system itself, for the Senator well knows that the weakness of a bad bank and the consequent run upon it may create a panic that will involve the strong banks of the country, for panics are absolutely irrational.

I do not wish to debate the matter with the Senator now because I do not wish to interrupt his splendid argument, but I should like the Senator to consider the question as to whether there is not some persuasive process, such as that pointed out by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], by which, by giving the State banks the benefit of the use of this emergency currency, we can attach conditions that would bring them in uniformity regarding these reserves.

I quite agree with the Senator regarding the fact that uniformity is not essential in all things; but it is, it seems to me, essential in some things. The Senator requires uniformity as to every national bank in the country as to reserves. If that be true, why does he sanction a diversity as to the reserves of State banks? Five thousand national banks are to be brought under regulations absolutely uniform regarding their reserves. If that be a wise regulation, why could not it be extended to the 6,000 other State banks, if we have powers either of persuasion or of compulsion over the matter? For my part I have no doubt about our powers of compulsion in the exercise of the national power to regulate interstate commerce, for all banks are, of course, engaged in interstate commerce, but I would gladly yield to the suggestion as to the power of persuasion.

Mr. BAILEY. A good example is always persuasive, and if Congress will deal wisely with the national banks under its jurisdiction it will go a long way toward inducing the State legislatures to deal wisely with the banks under their jurisdiction.

The Senator from Nevada, however, overestimates the harm of this dissimilarity. He forgets that side by side with marvelous strides both this system of national and that system of State banks have been growing for forty years. They have had their shocks and their reverses, but where in all the world can you point to a prosperity matching the prosperity of either of them? As for my part, I would rather destroy all banks and go back to barter than to destroy this dual system of government, and I shall never agree to unify our finances when to do so involves the obliteration of State lines. There are greater misfortunes in this world than poverty, and the greatest of all would be the loss of that liberty which can only be perpetuated through the preservation of State rights.

But, Mr. President, if it be true, as I believe it is, that the immediate cause of our financial disturbance was the overuse of bank credits, this is not a full or a final explanation of our troubles. We must go deeper and satisfy ourselves as to the influences which induced conservative bankers to extend their loans beyond what they ought to have known was a safe limit. Gambling in stocks and bonds and in agricultural products on the New York Exchanges will account for much, but it will not account for all that we have suffered. High living and overtrading have done their part in this bitter business, and extravagance, joined with a mad desire to get rich quick, has deflected our people in every part of the country from their personal habit of economy and their business habit of prudence. Congress itself has led in this wild revel of lavish expenditure, and from $248,000,000 twenty-two years ago we have increased the cost of administering this Government until we are now spending more than $1,000,000,000 each year. We appropriate the public money as if it were a creation of the law instead of labor, and we tax the American people as if taxation were a blessing instead of a burden. The infection of the Government's bad example has communicated itself to all classes, and men who once thought themselves fortunate if they could build a brick mansion are not satisfied now unless they can build a marble palace. What we once considered great luxuries are now regarded as mere comforts, and men of moderate means live at a rate which only the rich can afford to indulge. Under such circumstances it will always happen that speculation will be employed to win what honest industry could never hope to earn.

We must retrace our steps, sir, and recognize again the duty we owe ourselves, our families, and our country to live within our incomes. Then, and not until then, can we hope, as a nation or as individuals, to escape the penalty of spending more than we have made. I do not intend, Mr. President, to suggest that Congress can by law eradicate or regulate the evil practice of overtrading or high living, and we must trust to the common sense, to the self-respect, and to the patriotism of our people to correct those vices. I am not one of those who would invoke the law to restrain the conduct of men upon a slight occasion. I have always believed that it were better to endure the ills which spring from the right of individual judgment than to invite the greater ills which come from an undue abridgment of the citizen's liberty of action. I do not mean by this to say that men shall be left to injure others or to publicly debase themselves and answer the State by saying that they have merely exercised their individual right. There is a vast difference, sir, between liberty and license. The one is a goddess fair, all wreathed in light and smiles and beauty, bestowing with a generous hand her countless blessings on the human race; the other is a sorceress vile, a woman to the waist and fair, but ending in a serpent, armed with mortal coil, seducing godlike men to gross excesses and infinite despair. I would no more embrace the one than I would drive the other from me, and I thank the God of nations that in this enlightened age we have learned to carefully distinguish between the two.

I would prohibit and I would punish the offenses which reckless bankers have committed against the law, and by which they have wrecked the great institutions which it was their duty to strengthen and conserve; but, sir, I would not deny all men the right to manage their own affairs within safe lines because some men have abused that freeman's privilege. I would make convicts out of the criminals; but I would not make children out of honest bankers and deprive them of the right to conduct their business under a law which, if duly executed and enforced, is none too liberal now. I understand, of course, that we can prevent bad men from doing wrong by putting all men in strait-jackets; but I also know that we will thus prevent good men from doing what would be to their own and to their country's great advantage. If we permit ourselves to look only at the misdeeds of the few and forget the good deeds of the many, we may fall into a misanthropic frame of mind and make the mistake of legislating upon the theory that as some men abuse their freedom it shall be taken from us all. If this should come to pass, the men of this great Republic would lose the power of intellect and the self-control through which we fondly hope to complete a peaceful conquest of the world. Sir, I believe men are growing better instead of worse, and I would rather encourage that growth by giving greater freedom still than to discourage it by leaving them less to do according to their own untrammeled judgment and compelling them to do more according to the directions of a statute.

I am an optimist. I believe in the patriotism and the intelligence of my countrymen, and I believe they will vindicate before the world the experiment of self-government which our fathers inaugurated. I believe that they will teach the advocates of kingly government and the apostles of socialism as well that mankind can achieve its highest development and attain its greatest happiness under institutions which leave every man as free as is consistent with the peace and the good order of society. And even, Mr. President, when my countrymen disappoint my hope and when the spirit of faction seems stronger than a love of country, I do not despair. Through the darkness, as in the light, I cling to a persevering faith, and I remember that there is One above us who overrules kings and parliaments and who orders the destiny of republics better than presidents and congresses. I confide in Him, and I do not fear that He, under whose providence the sparrow falls and whose mercy stills the clamorous raven's nest, will permit this Government of the people and for the people and by the people to perish from the earth; but I believe that at His own good time and in His own good way He will inspire His children here with the wisdom to know and with the courage to do whatever may be for the best. From the iridescent dream of socialism and from the debasing avarice of monopoly which assail us in this day, I turn to the coming of that better day when our greatest intellects and our bravest hearts shall be called again to those high seats from which the mighty dead once governed us; and when that time comes, as come it shall, they will make our laws so just and equal and will administer them so firmly and so impartially that they will perpetuate forever and forever more this, the greatest, the freest, and therefore "the best Government that ever rose to animate the hopes or to bless the sacrifices of mankind." [Applause in the galleries.]

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE MEYER OF LOUISIANA.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. McENERY. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives announcing the death of Hon. ADOLPH MEYER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

In the House of Representatives, March 9, 1908.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound regret of the death of Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be authorized and directed to pay the necessary expenses in connection with the funeral of said Representative.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. McENERY. Mr. President, at some other time I will ask the Senate to set apart a day to commemorate the life, services, and character of General MEYER. I now offer the resolutions I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana offers resolutions which will be read.

The resolutions were read and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. McENERY. Mr. President, I submit the additional resolution which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 10, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 9, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, once more under the dispensation of Thy providence we are brought face to face with that mystery of mysteries which we call death, in the removal of a Member of this legislative body who for many years served with distinction in his fidelity to duty as a statesman.

We mourn him, but not as dead, since we have been taught to believe that in the Father's house are many mansions; that death is not an extinction of being, but the passing from one room to another.

Be with his colleagues and friends, the bereaved wife and daughter to comfort and sustain them, that they may look forward with hope to a meeting under more favorable circumstances, where the love tie shall never again be broken. "For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus, our Lord." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 7, 1908, was read and approved.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday, the 24th day of this month, be set aside for consideration of District business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that Tuesday, the 24th of March, be set aside for the consideration of District business. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did I understand it to be Tuesday, the 24th of March?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The 23d, two weeks from to-day, is the regular day.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has two weeks from to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; that is true, but there are eight or nine bills upon the Calendar now and there probably will be twenty by that time, and then we expect that one bill, I desire to say to the gentleman and the House, of itself ought to take all of one day, and we would not want to call it up any more than the trackage bill and have it considered partly on one day and then go over.

Mr. MANN. What bill is that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The public-service bill.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing on the Calendar that ought to take two hours to dispose of.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is true, but we have the right to look ahead and see what we may have at that time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. R. 28. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to donate certain cannon, with their accessories, to the State of New Hampshire;

S. 4030. An act to fix the pay of the Army;

S. 2736. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building in the city of Lagrange, Ga.; and

S. 2732. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building in the city of Cordele, Ga.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MEYER, OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, it is my painful duty to announce the death of my colleague, Gen. ADOLPH MEYER. At some future time I will ask the House to designate a day when suitable addresses to his memory may be made. I now ask that this resolution which I have prepared be presented.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound regret of the death of Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be authorized and directed to pay the necessary expenses in connection with the funeral of said Representative.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of Turner Grange, No. 28, Patrons of Husbandry, of Livermore, Me., and a petition of Topsham Grange, No. 37, Patrons of Husbandry, of Topsham, Me., praying for the passage of the so-called "rural parcels-post bill," which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BURKETT presented a memorial of sundry citizens of College View, Nebr., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prevent Sunday banking in post-offices in the handling of money orders and registered letters, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Equal Suffrage Club, of Roca, Nebr., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the disfranchisement of citizens of the United States on account of sex, which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 24, Stereotypers and Electrotypers' Union, of Omaha, Nebr., praying for the repeal of the duty on white paper, wood pulp, and the materials used in the manufacture thereof, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LONG presented a petition of the Southwestern Lumbermen's Association of the United States, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the present interstate-commerce law granting a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission before any change in interstate freight rates becomes effective, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented memorials of sundry business firms and citizens of Axtell, Mulvane, Pratt, and Winfield, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "parcels-post bill," which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 1661, United Mine Workers of America, of Weir, Kans., and the memorial of C. B. Hoffman, of Kansas City, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "Penrose bill" to amend the postal laws relating to the freedom of the press, which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Southwestern Lumbermen's Association of the United States, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the compilation of directories by postmasters containing the names of persons receiving mail at their respective offices, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. RAYNER presented a petition of Cecil Grange, No. 3, Patrons of Husbandry, of Rising Sun, Md., praying for the passage of the so-called "parcels-post bill," which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

STATUE OF JOHN WITHERSPOON.

Mr. BRIGGS. I ask for the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 6) directing the selection of a site for the erection of a bronze statue in Washington, D. C., in honor of John Witherspoon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution was read, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to create a commission to be composed of the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of War, and the chairman of the Witherspoon Memorial Association to select and prepare a site on property belonging to the United States in the city of Washington, other than the grounds of the Capitol or Library of Congress, and erect thereon a suitable pedestal for a statue in bronze of John Witherspoon, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, to be provided by the Witherspoon Memorial Association.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution directing the selection of a site and the erection of a pedestal for a bronze statue in Washington, D. C., in honor of John Witherspoon."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13875) for the relief of John V. Johnson, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DOLLIVER, from the Committee on Education and Labor, reported an amendment proposing to appropriate $40,000 to enable the Commissioner of Education to conduct from time to time special investigations respecting industrial education, rural schools, agricultural and mechanical colleges, etc., intended to be proposed to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5207) for the relief of William Radcliffe, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6043) granting a pension to Zim C. Corbin, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McCUMBER introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6044) granting a pension to Joseph Goose;

A bill (S. 6045) granting an increase of pension to Charles Lauder; and

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment authorizing the Auditor for the Navy Department to credit in the settlement of the accounts of Paymaster Herbert E. Stevens, United States Navy, with the sum of $2,760.88, being the value of clothing and small stores stolen from him, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment authorizing Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress to send by registered mail free of charge United States maps and other valuable Government publications, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS TO CERTAIN PERSONS.

Mr. SCOTT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 15653) to increase the pension of widows, minor children, etc., of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, etc., and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SCOTT to the bill (H. R. 15653) to increase the pension of widows, minor children, etc., of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, etc., and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war:

On page 3, after line 9, insert as section 2:

"That all nurses now on the pension roll, or who may hereafter be placed on said roll under existing law, shall be entitled to receive pension as follows: In case such nurse has reached the age of 62 years, $12 per month; at the age of 70 years, $15 per month; and at the age of 75 years, $20 per month; and nothing herein contained shall prevent any nurse entitled to a pension from prosecuting her claim and receiving a pension under any other general or special act: Provided, That no nurse shall receive a pension under any other law at the same time or for the same period that she is receiving a pension under the provisions of this act."

REPORT ON OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. FULTON. I ask for an order to print 300 additional copies of the report on House bill 15372.

Mr. CLAPP. I object to the printing of additional copies of that report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. FULTON. I wish only to state, Mr. President, that there has been a very great demand for copies of this report, and I am informed by the superintendent of the document room that they will not have enough copies to supply the demand.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator what bill it is.

Mr. FULTON. It is the omnibus claims bill.

Mr. CLAPP. If there are not enough reports for Senators I am perfectly willing that there shall be more printed, but I am certainly opposed to flooding this section with those reports.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE SENATOR REDFIELD PROCTOR.

Mr. DILLINGHAM submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice-President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator from the State of Vermont, Hon. REDFIELD PROCTOR, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I offer a resolution for reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be held in connection with an investigation of the relative effects of outside and inside explosive shell, the consideration already accorded these subjects, and the effect of their use upon the design of war ships.

Resolved further, That the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and that the expenses thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, the results of such investigation to be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so referred.

LAND DISTRICT IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16860) to establish a United States land district in the Territory of New Mexico to be known as the "Tucumcari land district."

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

S. 5255. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the shipping bill, so called, may be laid before the Senate, according to the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce."

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] suggested to me that he desires to speak on this bill to-day. I do not see him in the Chamber. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has given notice that he will address the Senate on the bill next Friday.

Mr. President, there is a good deal of business pending in the Senate, and I rise to ask unanimous consent that the bill and all amendments pending and to be offered be voted on upon Friday, the 20th instant, before adjournment on that day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the pending bill, together with amendments pending and to be offered, be voted on before the adjournment of the Senate on Friday, the 20th instant. Is there objection?

Mr. BACON. I am not going to object to the date, but I want to get a little information from the Senator. I suppose the Senator would arrange, in view of an agreement of that kind, so that there would be an opportunity on the last day or two to be heard by anyone who desires to speak on the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I feel sure there will be no difficulty about that.

Mr. BACON. The only suggestion in my mind was that possibly there might be some special order which would interfere. I thought possibly the Senator might desire to couple with his request for a vote on that day some provision looking to the occupation of the time of that day for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will modify the request by asking that the bill be taken up on Friday the 20th, immediately after the morning business, and that it have consideration until it shall be voted upon on that day.

Mr. BACON. I understand that if unanimous consent were given in the form in which the Senator has asked it, nothing could intervene between the taking up of the bill in the morning and the vote on it, whereas it might suit the convenience of the Senate to lay it aside temporarily for some purpose and take it up again during the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. We can do that by unanimous consent, I suggest to the Senator, at any time during the day.

Mr. BACON. The agreement could be varied by unanimous consent, it is true, but would it not be better that the Senator should so shape his request as that it could be done informally on the request of a Senator?

Mr. GALLINGER. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. BACON. I do not think there is any trouble to be apprehended. I only make the suggestion in view of having proper elasticity in the agreement.

Mr. GALLINGER. That will be understood, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be taken up for consideration immediately after the close of the routine morning business on Friday the 20th instant, and that the bill, together with pending amendments and amendments to be offered, be voted on before adjournment upon that day. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. In this connection, I will venture to suggest, that Senators having speeches to make on the bill will doubtless have abundant opportunity before that date. I will endeavor to see that that privilege shall be accorded.

Mr. BACON. I do not myself desire to make any speech, but several of us may wish to say a few words on various features of the bill.

SURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 138) to provide for the survey of the public lands of the State of Idaho.

The Secretary read the bill and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, in line 3, after the word "lands," to insert "reserved and unreserved;" in line 4 to strike out the word "State" and insert "States;" and in the same line, after the word "Idaho," to insert "Oregon, Montana, and California," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all public lands, reserved and unreserved, of the United States now unsurveyed within the States of Idaho, Oregon, Montana, and California shall be surveyed without regard to settlement thereon, pursuant to the general system of surveys of the public lands of the United States, and that said surveys shall be completed as rapidly as possible.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the survey of the public lands of the States of Idaho, Oregon, Montana and California."

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. McLAURIN. I ask that Senate bill 3023, to amend the national banking laws, be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senator from Mississippi to yield to me for a moment, merely to give a notice.

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire to give notice that on Thursday next at 2 o'clock, with the permission of the Senate, I shall address the Senate on the pending bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I lay no claim to any special knowledge of or experience in financiering that would entitle me to pose as a financier. My financial operations have been confined to the support of a large family upon a small income. I shall not, therefore, expect or endeavor to shed any additional light upon the subject of financies, nor to contribute anything new to the fund of learning and information respecting the functions of money.

However, there are some thoughts in reference to the pending measure emanating from my conception of the proper office of human government and the true sense of justice which intuitively occur to me, and I beg the patient indulgence of the Senate while I present them for your consideration.

The bill under consideration—S. 3023—entitled "A bill to amend the national banking laws," grows out of the recent panic. The panic grows out of causes that are not all so recent. Every effect has a cause by which it is produced. Some effects are produced by a train of causes, and some by a conglomeration of causes. There is generally a first cause from which the train of conglomeration of causes flows to produce the effect. If I were called to name the first or fundamental cause that led to the present panic, I should say that it was the incompetent, inefficient, and misguided administration of the Government by the Republican party.

Let it not be said that I am making a political question of this. It is not in my power nor in the power of any other individual to make this a political question. Its political aspect is given by the different views that are taken of it by different men, just as the tariff and the construction of the Constitution, whether liberal or strict, are made political questions. I do not propose nor desire to castigate the Republican party further than is necessary for the country's good. When a patient is sick a wise physician first ascertains the disease, then inquires of the cause, and if that is learned applies the remedy to remove the cause, and then, if necessary, tonics the patient. Sometimes in the treatment of the case it becomes necessary to administer drastic remedies, but in the end they serve the best purpose. It may be necessary to so deal with the Republican party. It is hoped that good to the country will thereby be accomplished.

Men do not plant a crop one day with the expectation of gathering it the next; nor do the evil effects of vicious or unwise legislation immediately manifest themselves. The panic of 1893 was the harvest of the Republican Administration from 1889 to 1893. The prosperity which immediately followed 1896 was the harvest of the Democratic Administration from 1893 to 1897, and the discovery of superlarge quantities of gold and adding it to the metal money of the country. When the panic of 1893 came, it was flippantly charged by the Republican orators to the Democratic Administration that had just been inducted into office, when they had not enacted a law nor performed any official act except to execute laws that had been enacted by the Republican Administration. Of course, under such circumstances it was impossible that the Democratic Administration could have produced the panic. Causes do not succeed but precede the effects they produce. In 1897, when prosperity dawned, it was heralded as a Republican achievement. Not a Republican law had been enacted nor a Republican policy put in operation since the last preceding Democratic Administration. The Republicans, seeing the firm foundation laid by a Democratic Administration for great prosperity, and knowing that such prosperity was bound to come, heralded the Republican President as the agent of that prosperity. If he were the agent, it was the agency of the Democratic Administration that had just preceded.

A great many people, not understanding the real causes of the prosperity at the time, and, therefore, not knowing its limitations, engaged in all kinds of speculation. Municipal corporations issued bonds and raised money on them for improvements. Some of the money was invested in such betterments, and some of it was absorbed in peculation. Vast numbers of private corporations, sometimes without capital or property, issued bonds and borrowed money on them; so that the bonded indebtedness of the United States exceeded many times the money in circulation in the entire country.

The Philippines were taken from Spain and $20,000,000 given for them. Hundreds of millions of dollars more were wasted on the islands and on that people who have never been worth anything to the world or to any government or country owning them, and who never will be worth anything so long as time lasts. They were a millstone hung about the neck of Spain, and they have been a curse to us.

Our standing Army was increased in time of peace without the slightest necessity and against the true principles of free government. A fleet of war ships is sent on a useless jaunt of thousands of miles, at great expense, "to fright the souls of fearful adversaries," and incidentally to engage in the Christian (?) pastime of witnessing bull fights, where only two or three men were gored by mad bulls.

I have neither the time nor the disposition to enumerate the delinquencies of the Republican party; indeed, no one memory can carry them all. The details of the Credit Mobilier; grants to railroad corporations of the public domain in extent sufficient to carve out States; the collection of billions of dollars from the people and giving these sums to a few of a favorite class under the guise of protection; the giving of bounties and subsidies; not only the disregard but the defiance of the laws would all be profitable in the investigation of the causes that led to the panic. But I must content myself with this mere reference to them; a mere glance at the domain of their investigation. When a trust had been prosecuted to judgment, there was no enforcement of the sentence, it being virtually said that these are academic questions, and that there was no disposition on the part of the Republican Administration to run amuck among the trusts. In effect it was to show, and no more, that it was in the power of the Administration to eliminate the trusts if it so desired; that the law was sufficient, but that the Administration was not willing to eradicate trusts with all their complicated banes.

The Republican party poses as the friend of the laboring man; especially is this so just on the eve of a Presidential election. The party claims that money collected by a protective tariff is for the benefit of the laboring man, and it is primarily the solicitude for the laboring man that provokes the imposition of the protective tariff. This is easily tested. If it were true, the money would be given to the laborer to employ the capitalist to work for him. Instead, however, it is given to the capitalist to employ the laborer to work for him. The money is given by the Republican party to the man who is already rich, but the man who is poor and earns his "bread in the sweat of his face" is compelled to labor for it. Thus billions of dollars that ought to be distributed among the people who produced it is given to a few who spend it in riotous living, in traveling abroad, and in the purchase of worthless counts and dukes and earls and barons.

You established a banking system whereby you loaned, practically without interest, to the national banks the money of the Government on which to operate, under such circumstances and conditions that it flowed in a steady stream into New York, and so filled the New York banks that they were tempted to, and did, loan it for all kinds of lawless speculation and stock gambling.

After a long carnival of crime, a saturnalia of graft, and a revelry of plunder the day of account came, and the bubble burst. We then had what the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] denominates the most "acute and destructive" panic in the country's history. Its acuteness and destructiveness may be estimated from the fact that the president of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company said, if he was correctly reported by the press, that this company discharged from work 8,000 men in December. This system of railroads operates 2,672 miles of road. It is one of the forty-two systems operating in this country on an average of 4,511 miles each. If the dismissals by the New York, New Haven and Hartford can be taken as a proportional average, and if the report is correct, there were more than a half million—about 600,000—men who earn their living by their labor turned out of employment by the railroad companies alone. This does not take account of the myriads discharged from the employment of other industries. Mr. J. M. de Julien is reported by the press as saying that on a thousand miles of road between Ogden, Utah, and Montpelier, Idaho, 50,000 men are out of employment. When you draw the picture of the wrecked fortunes of the wealthy, draw beside it the picture of the hungry and scantily clothed families of these discharged laboring people. This is a part of the fruit of the panic. As I have said, the bubble burst and the panic came as should have been expected.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would it bother the Senator if I were to make a statement as to unemployed men in Idaho?

Mr. McLAURIN. I have no objection to the Senator making that statement.

Mr. HEYBURN. Idaho during all this panic has kept employed more than 10,000 men on constructive railroad work, who were not affected in any way whatever by the panic; and the mines have continued their operation. If there is any State in the United States that has gone on regardless of this alleged panic, it is the State of Idaho. We are working 7,000 men on construction work in the county in which I live.

Mr. McLAURIN. This is the statement of Mr. De Julien——

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know who he is at all.

Mr. McLAURIN. Who is a prominent business man of that section. He states that between Ogden, Utah, and Montpelier, Idaho, there are 50,000 men now idle. He is a business man there, and I give his statement for what it is worth. We know there are many thousands—I may say hundreds of thousands—who are looking for employment and can not find it.

Thereupon a bill is introduced "To amend the national banking laws." The question naturally presents itself: Were the national banking laws defective? If so, did the defectiveness of the banking laws produce the panic or contribute to it in any considerable degree? Or did the disregard of the laws—statutory, moral, and business laws—by the national banks produce, or materially contribute to, the panic? These are not idle questions; but they are questions that lie at the very foundation of this matter, and should be correctly solved at the threshold of its investigation.

Again, if the panic was superinduced by the national banks' disregard of the laws, was that disregard characterized by all of the banks, or only a part of the banks? If by only a part, what part, and what banks? If the banks of the country outside of New York City were doing a legitimate business, on safe and sound banking principles, while the banks of New York City were "plunging," in utter contempt of law and the rights of others, and thereby precipitated a panic upon the legitimate, innocent banks, State and national, and upon the country, then we do not need any bill "To amend the national banking laws," but we need an Administration to enforce the laws by the punishment of the guilty criminals whose crimes precipitated the crisis and whose greed gorged upon the distress its cupidity had created. Such a Democratic Administration we hope to have after the 4th of March, 1909.

I am not opposed to banks. I am not unfriendly to them; I am friendly to them. They are useful institutions. They serve a great and beneficent purpose. They are, as a rule, conducted by honest and patriotic men; and should be protected and encouraged by friendly legislation, just as the farmer, merchant, mechanic, professional men, and all other law-abiding people should be protected and encouraged by friendly legislation. Nor is it any pleasure to me to arraign the New York City banks. Nor would I arraign them if I could believe that their delinquencies consisted only of misjudgment or misplaced confidence in legitimate transactions. But it seems to me impossible that they did not know the loans they were making were to be used in the most demoralizing species of gambling. Without doubt they knew their reserves were far below the limit.

The panic came when the banks of New York City failed to honor the checks of their customers who had deposits with them. This was no fault of the national banking laws. After the Secretary of the Treasury had almost emptied the Treasury into their vaults, and they had received large imports of gold, they still failed to transmit to their customers their customers' deposits. Do not misunderstand me to adversely criticise the Secretary for utilizing every dollar that could be spared from the Treasury to avert the catastrophe. The endeavor to check the panic was the fruit of a patriotic motive, however ill-advised the method adopted.

While the banks of New York City with this gold in their vaults were refusing country banks the money of these country banks on deposit with them, little ephemeral concerns around the corner were selling money to these country banks at a premium ranging from 3 per cent all the way up to grand larceny. Business men believed that these ephemeral concerns were adjuncts of the banks that held and declined to deliver their money, and this added to the acuteness of the panic.

I was told by a gentleman than whom no one in this or any other country stands higher in character that during the panic some bankers and business men of Louisiana sold cotton for gold in Europe, had the gold shipped to New York banks, and when they presented exchange to the New York banks for it were denied their own money, but were at the same time told by these banks where they could buy money.

I presume that it will not be denied that if the New York banks—and when I say New York I mean New York City—had promptly paid to their depositors all checks drawn against deposits in them there would not have been any fear as to monetary conditions, and consequently no panic, for a panic is nothing more than fear set in motion. I am equally sure that if the New York banks had kept the law and held all the reserves they were required to hold they would, with the assistance received from the Treasury and importations of gold, have been amply able to cash every lawful check drawn upon them as presented. Such course would have immediately dissipated any and all apprehension that could have arisen.

My judgment may be in error, but I do not agree with the proposition that the New York bank that holds three-fifths of the 15 per cent reserve of the country bank has a right to use that for anything except to honor the checks of the bank whose depository it is. If that had been done, then the New York banks would have had far more reserves than they did have, they would have been able to meet every check that was presented to them and to cash it as presented, and there never would have been any necessity for any fear or apprehension on the part of anybody, and without fear or apprehension there could have been no panic.

I do not arrogate to myself any superior ken in the interpretation of statutes, nor would I minify the opinions of those who differ from me; but it seems to me vain to hold that Congress intended that the reserves should never be utilized, but held as a bulk of dead capital—not dead money, for money is a medium of exchange, and if the banks were not permitted to use it, yet required to chloroform it and put it to bed, its character as money would, for the time, be lost. So many pieces of glass would do as much work in the operation of money during this time. The intention of the law is that the banks must not loan more than 75 per cent of their deposits; that they must keep 25 per cent to meet the checks of their depositors. It was not only the right of the New York banks to use the reserve to pay their depositors, but it was their duty.

So it was not the defect of the banking laws that produced the panic. It was the fault of the New York bankers in loaning more than 75 per cent of their deposits, and that for gambling in stocks and bonds and futures, and the dereliction of the Administration in not prosecuting the malefactors to conviction and punishment. Those malefactors are not deterred from the commission of such crimes, because they expect the penalty to be satisfied by the imposition of a fine upon the interests they represent, thus punishing the innocent shareholder, instead of putting the guilty criminals in prison. The Treasury has so often been emptied into the laps of the malefactors when their crimes have produced money stringency that they have come to look upon it as a right.

The banking laws have defects, but those defects did not cause or contribute to the panic, and this bill, so far from curing the defects, really offers to aggravate them.

The principal defect in the banking laws is the provision for the issuance of money by the Government in the name of the banks. Men inveigh against the law for abdicating to the banks the Government prerogative of issuing money. It is worse than that; the Government itself issues the money in the name of the bank instead of in the name of the United States, as all money should be issued by the Government. Whatever form may be given the transaction, the Government understands, the bank understands, and everyone who handles the notes understands that the Government is to pay the holder of the notes, and nobody looks to the banks for their payment or considers them in the matter.

Another defect is, the Government loans these notes, issued in the name of the banks, at 1 per cent interest, while it is paying a higher rate of interest to the banks on the bonds deposited as security. One of two things should be done, first, loan to the banks Treasury notes of the par value of United States bonds deposited and suspend interest on the bonds, or second, exchange Treasury notes with the bank of the par value of the bonds for the bonds and cancel the bonds.

We can not predicate our banking system upon that of any other government; for in other countries the people belong to the government, while in our country the Government belongs to the people—or, at least, this is the theory of our Government. Therefore, citations of the banking systems or banking laws of other countries are not always apropos. Let it always, in the consideration of this bill and of the panic that gave it birth, be borne in mind that a system of banking laws and a system of banking are not necessarily identical. The system of banking laws may be good while the system of banking is bad. So the system of banking laws may be good and the system of banking in criminal defiance of the laws, and this is what I am sure produced the panic. It is sometimes better to have an unwise law wisely administered than a wise law not administered at all.

There is no need for amendment of the banking laws in behalf of the banks. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] says:

> The report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that the dividends paid by the national banks for the sixteen months prior to June 30, 1907, were at the rate of 13 per cent per annum on their capital and surplus.

This would be a pretty good dividend on their capital; but on capital and surplus it seems to me to be a large dividend. When it is considered that banks do not usually declare a dividend of all their earnings, it would seem that it is not necessary to amend the banking laws to enable banks to subsist.

One bank with a capital of $300,000 had a surplus of over $7,000,000.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi what bank it is which he states has a capital of $300,000 and a surplus of over $7,000,000?

Mr. McLAURIN. It is said to be the Chemical National Bank of New York.

Mr. KEAN. It used to be the case that that bank had a capital of $300,000 and a surplus of $7,000,000, but you will find that now it has a capital of $3,000,000 and a large surplus. That change was made after we passed the other law.

Mr. McLAURIN. It is the same thing. If they paid in $300,000 and are able now to increase it ten times and still have a surplus of more than $4,000,000, they must be doing a pretty good business, and it is not necessary that the banking laws should be amended in order that they may subsist.

Mr. KEAN. I do not think the Chemical National Bank wants the banking laws amended so that they can exist.

Mr. McLAURIN. I should think not.

Mr. KEAN. I think they have been in existence longer than either the Senator from Mississippi or myself.

Mr. McLAURIN. But we are told that the interests of banks are not to be considered in this legislation; that the only consideration is the interest of the general public; that the business welfare of all the people alike is alone to be had in affectionate and sacred regard in the law to stifle panics. Then why not permit the expansion of the currency, when needed, upon the application of any person or persons presenting the required security, instead of the exclusive application of some of the national banks? Why not loan money to any person who presents the required security instead of loaning it exclusively to the national banks?

You say the banks are the fiscal agents of the Government. That is the merest and flimsiest fiction. When asked what agency they perform for the Government, you say they receive the Government's deposits and thereupon cash the Government's checks. They do the same for every depositor. They are no more the agents of the Government than is the merchant with whom the Government trades. They are simply borrowers and the Government a lender in the transaction. If one person puts his money into the possession of another with the mutual understanding that the other is to use it in his own business and account to him for it, the transaction is a loan.

The chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. ALDRICH] says:

> The practical effect of the operation of note issue is that the Government loans a bank, taking a portion of its investment securities as collateral, a sum of money, for which it charges, in the form of taxes, one-half per cent per month until the loan is repaid.

"The operation" of which the able and astute Senator was speaking was "the operation" of the bill now under consideration. Then why not loan the money, on the same security, to the merchant, farmer, or any other business man?

The Secretary of the Treasury, speaking of the impending crisis, says:

> Rumors were current concerning many manufacturing establishments and others interested in large projects who were embarrassed by inability to raise ready cash to continue their operations.

I infer from reading the Secretary's paper that he regards this as the herald raindrop that foretold the approach of the mustering storm. Then, if these manufacturers "and others" could furnish the proper and appropriate security, why should not the law be such that the Government could loan the money direct to them instead of taking the circuitous route of the banks?

I hold that money should not be loaned by the Government to banks or any other class, but if it is to be loaned, that no bond except United States bonds should be accepted by the Government as a security for a loan of the Government's money; but if money is to be loaned on railroad bonds the manufacturers "and others," of whom the Secretary speaks, upon the hypothecation of these bonds should receive the money direct from the Treasury. It would be paid out immediately in the operation of the establishment, carried to the merchant by the laborer in the purchase of supplies for subsistence, used by the merchant in his business, thus getting into the arteries of commerce and performing the functions of money in a thousand ramifications before the panic could show its gorgon face.

The loaning of money by the Government is wrong in principle. But as the Government has embarked upon this kind of policy, I think it should be careful to not extend the system in accordance with the terms of this bill; it should not, from this time on, loan money to banks nor to anyone else to be again loaned. If the object of this bill is to meet and prevent panics, as I understand its friends to claim, it should go no further than to provide the banks with money in times of crises to pay depositors—not money to loan. Panics do not occur among banks because they do not have money to loan, but because they do not, or it is feared they do not, have money to pay depositors. To this extent alone should the Government, in any event, go to their relief.

Senators misconceive the situation when they figure that banks in distress in time of panic will not avail themselves of offered money because they do not see where they can invest it for an added return. The bank in Kansas City, that was in a solvent and prosperous condition, could well have afforded to pay interest that would have absorbed a year's profits.

But if the Government, seeing a bank struggling to keep its head above water until the tempest calms and the waves are pacified, throws it a line in the form of a well-secured loan, why should it not do the same thing for the farmer, merchant, manufacturer, railroad, mechanic, and all the other enterprises that combine to make this the greatest country of all the ages?

I have said that the principle of loaning money by the Government is wrong. It is no part of the office of government to loan money. A people who neither have the desire nor capacity for self-government, and therefore no aspiration for freedom and individuality, may yearn for the flesh pots of Egypt, but the patriot who is trying to get all he can out of himself for his country wants nothing of government except just laws for his protection impartially administered. The principle is not only wrong, but the policy of loaning it as proposed in this bill is bad. The bill not only confines the loans to the national banks, but to only a part of the national banks. If you do not take care of all the banks, State and national, you can not prevent nor check panics by taking care of some of them. If one bank fails, the business of the country immediately takes notice; if two or three fail, it is on tension; and if a half dozen or more fail, or are known to be pressed, fear takes form and panic is the result.

When Congress legislates against the recurrence of panics the legislation should give reasonable hope of its efficiency. There is no such hope if some of the national banks and all of the State banks are excluded from the relief that is provided, as is the case with this bill.

The suggestion sometimes made, though happily not in this bill, that the Government guarantee depositors of national banks is vicious in principle and equity and inadequate in policy. It still leaves the danger of panics almost as threatening as if the guaranty were not given to the national banks' deposits. To guarantee the depositors of banks is nothing more than becoming surety of the banks for all the obligations they may incur. This bill proposes to make the Government the principal, and, I may say, sole obligor in the notes to be issued, as a matter of form, in the name of the banks. True it proposes to take securities from the banks, in the way of indemnity. But some of these securities are liable to turn out an investment as hollow as "Shallow's funded debt on Falstaff," as Baldwin said of Bolus. When the Government becomes sponsor for the notes put in circulation in the name of the banks, it knows what it is doing. It knows the exact extent of its responsibility; so many millions of bank notes; and for every dollar it has a dollar of United States bonds for its indemnity. The amount is mathematically certain, and the indemnity is absolutely sure.

But the guaranty of deposits, which is nothing but becoming surety for the banks, is different and dangerous. The deposits are more than $13,000,000,000, a sum that staggers arithmetic. It is more than eight times the money in circulation in the United States. If the Government were made surety for the banks, its indebtedness were increased more than $13,000,000,000. You say that it is not expected that the Government will have to pay this large sum. True enough; neither does Jones expect to pay the debt of Joyce when he signs his note as surety, but his liabilities are increased the amount of the note. So the Government would become liable to pay $13,000,000,000 on demand.

But, you say, the law should be so framed that the Government would have time to pay, upon failure of the bank. Then your expedient would prove abortive; for it is the fact that the depositor can get his money immediately upon demand that averts fear, and it is the averting of fear that arrests panics.

The credit of the United States is equal if not superior to that of any other country. It is based upon the immutable principle of large resources and small liabilities. It does not answer to say that this country is able to pay thirteen billions of dollars without crippling its resources, even if it is true. You can call to mind men who can pay a hundred millions of dollars and still live in extravagant luxury, yet the assumption by them of a hundred millions of dollars liability as surety would cause investors to look askant.

Again, it is wrong and unjust in principle for the Government to become surety for the banks. The office of Government is to make and administer laws for the protection of life, liberty, and property. These laws should give equal rights to every citizen, and their administration should treat every citizen with impartial consideration. There should not be any class distinction in the enactment and administration of the laws. The laborer with the spade and shovel and pick in his hands should therein be treated on the same terms as the President of the United States. The banks should be treated as everybody else. If it is right for the Government to become surety for the banks, it is right to become surety for the farmer and the merchant and the manufacturer and the prosecutors of all the other vocations.

I will not detain the Senate by animadverting upon the many advantages that would accrue to the prosecutors of these industries and professions and vocations by the suretyship of the Government extended to them. They will immediately occur to anyone upon reflection.

The banks of the country do not need the suretyship of the Government. The banks were never in a better condition in the history of this country than they are to-day. There never was a time in American history when the banks were conducted by more patriotic or better business men. While the late panic did a great deal of harm, and is now doing harm as the cause of so many unemployed men and women, its lesson is not without value. If those charged with the administration of the law will expiate their nonfeasance in this matter by the prosecution and adequate punishment of the generators of the panic, there will not be another panic as long as the gold metal can do the work of metal money in this country.

It ought to be obvious that State, municipal, and railroad bonds should not be made the basis of security for the issuance of money to the banks. As long as United States bonds were the security upon which money was loaned to the banks everybody knew that in the very nature of things the security was bound to be sufficient to pay the notes, and therefore depositors felt safe in depositing money in national banks. But listen to this from the chairman of the committee [Mr. ALDRICH], speaking of the means of indemnity held by the Government for its suretyship on the bank notes: "Third. We have a prior lien upon all the assets of the bank through which the notes are issued." That is to say, the deposits of depositors in national banks are liable to the Government for the payment of the bank notes, if the security taken by the Government when the loan to the bank was made by the Government is insufficient to indemnify the Government.

Nobody cared about that when the security consisted of United States bonds, because the bonds and the obligation of the banks on the bank notes offset each other. But State, municipal, and railroad bonds are not so. You may proclaim from the housetops that there has been great care in scrutinizing the securities, but men will be wary in depositing money in national banks if they know that that money immediately becomes liable to pay the loan of the Government to the bank if the security should fail. They know that the security can not fail if it consists of United States bonds, but they have no such faith in railroad bonds. I bid you be careful how you tamper with this matter. You are sporting above a volcano.

If no unwise legislation is enacted—indeed, if no legislation at all is enacted—the present convalescent condition of the country will continue to improve until normal conditions will obtain. If you do not tinker with the present banking laws, but enforce them, they are ample for the prevention of bank panics. The greater fear is that of bank-made panics. It were better if this change in the banking laws were made; that is, call in the bank notes and issue to the banks Treasury notes in their stead. In this way the loss or destruction of the notes would redound to the gain of the Government that gives them efficacy as money instead of to the gain of the banks that can give them no circulation without the Government's indorsement.

There was issued from August 21, 1862, to February 15, 1876, when its issuance ended, $368,724,079.45 in fractional paper currency. Of this issue $15,239,368.28 is now outstanding, of which the Treasurer estimates that $8,375,934 has been lost or destroyed. There is no doubt that none of it will ever be presented for redemption. In this there is a gain of more than $15,000,000. Who should gain it, the Government that gives it value or some private institution?

But it were possibly better not to make at present even the change that I have suggested, because any numismatic legislation that is at all complicated is calculated at this time to inflame rather than extinguish fear. There is not so much danger in it as in the bill under consideration, but possibly enough to make it questionable.

But if there are to be loans at all by the Government, there is potential legislation that could not excite the least apprehension, yet would give all the protection against panics that legislation can offer. I introduced a bill on the 9th of December last embracing this idea. It is probably not as elaborate in detail as it can be made, but it embodies the principle. Let anyone who has a United States bond present it to the Treasury or subtreasury and thereupon require the Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer to issue to him Treasury notes of the par value of the bond; suspend the interest of the bond for the time and in addition charge 3 per cent per annum interest on the notes, and if the notes are not repaid to the Government within a certain time cancel the bond and thus close the transaction. The Government would thereby save the interest on its bond and collect interest on the note if the borrower pays the note, and if he does not pay it, the bond is canceled and the interest-bearing debt of the Government is paid by agreement.

Of course I understand that the note must some day be paid by the Government, but the debt does not any longer carry interest, and its payment is made easy.

I believe it best, and I would so shape the law, that the Government should not loan money at all; neither to banks nor any other person, but that upon presentation of a United States bond of any denomination the Treasurer of the United States should issue to the holder its par value in Treasury notes and cancel the bond. You thereby increase the circulation when needed and stop interest on the Government bonds. You also give an equal opportunity to all State banks that you do to national banks to get money. It is the duty of the Government to not discriminate between its citizens, and the State banks are its citizens as well as the national banks.

This, to be sure, would expand the medium serving for the purpose of money to the extent of the United States bonds canceled and notes issued in their stead, but while that is so those notes would continue to remain out. It would keep an equilibrium of the circulating medium, and there are not United States bonds sufficient to make any danger from the small expansion of the currency that would be thereby created.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEYBURN in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That would be the making of one debt by the Government to be secured by another debt of the Government, would it not?

Mr. McLAURIN. I think not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You say "a note secured by a bond." Both are obligations of the Government.

Mr. McLAURIN. You just exchange them. The bank owes the Government for the notes and the Government owes the bank for the bond. The two obligations offset each other.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It would be changing the form of indebtedness, then?

Mr. McLAURIN. Every person, natural or artificial, could have an equal opportunity under this law. Is this equal opportunity for all what you desire? But, you say, we want some provision for an emergency. That provision is just what this would make. You see emergency is individual, just as yellow fever or whooping cough. Emergency comes to every man when he needs money and can not get it. If the generality of the people need money and can not get it the emergency becomes general, just as smallpox becomes epidemic. If you will provide a way whereby each man can supply his emergency, there can not be any general emergency, and of course no panic.

There are now millions of dollars in hiding that are neither doing the owners nor the business of the country any tangible good. What you want to do, both for the benefit of the owners and of commerce, is to tole or coax this money into circulation. The owner of hidden money takes a great risk in burying it or hiding it in a stocking. He may die without disclosing its hiding and it will be lost from his estate; it may be discovered and stolen; he may, himself, lose the place of its hiding; rats may eat it if it is paper, or fire burn it or floods sweep it away or thieves find and steal it if it is gold, and many other dangers he incurs in hoarding. He balances these dangers against the danger of depositing it in a bank, and the one he deems to be the less he adopts.

Anything that can be justly done to cause the man who has money to see that it is safer to deposit it in banks or invest or loan it should be done by Congress that it may be put into circulation. Every thinking man knows that there is some danger wherever he may place his money. But much can be done to convince men of that which I am sure is a fact, that if they are not going to invest or loan their money the safest place for it is in a reputable bank. Besides, if men knew that they could at will convert their bonds into money they would, instead of burying it, invest it in bonds, thus putting the money into circulation, and almost invariably the bulk of the money that is in circulation is deposited in banks and checks are drawn against it. This is argued by the fact that in New York City alone the clearing-house transactions are nearly $300,000,000 a day.

There is only one other security comparable to United States bonds as a predicate for the loan of Government money. Always bear in mind that the bill of the committee proposes to loan money to the banks, as I have shown and as the chairman of the committee [Mr. ALDRICH] has said. The giving to the loan the name of deposits does not change the form or substance of the transaction. And I am contending that, it being a loan, if it is proper for the Government to loan money to one class it is equally proper to loan money to any other class on equally good security. Railroad bonds may be good and marketable in times of money plenty, and in such times the Government might be able to realize money on them, but in times of general emergency they balk, both at home and abroad. For the money at home has sought shelter and is not in circulation to buy them, and money abroad distrusts them when they are dishonored at home.

But money can always be realized on cotton. If money at home is in hiding, it will come forth from abroad for cotton. The emergency never gets so stringent that cotton can not be turned into money. There is no distrust of it in Europe, for in Europe it is a prime necessity. It is imperishable. No weevil nor insect can destroy it nor does age deteriorate its value.

After supplying the factories of this country about $500,000,000 worth of cotton is exported annually. At the first shudder of apprehension let it be known that this vast resource can be turned into Treasury notes until the cotton can be converted into gold from Europe to retire these Treasury notes and the chill of fear will be averted. It is said that this would give advantage to one product that other products do not have. The law would not give it; nature has already given the advantage. There is no other product that combines the advantages that pertain to cotton as a commodity.

It is said that this is legislation in favor of the farmer class. I do not believe in class legislation. But if legislation should favor one class, there is none more worthy of the favor than is the farmer class. Whatever may be said in regard to any other class, it is certain that without the farmer class no civilized people could survive.

I repeat, if this were class legislation, I would neither advocate nor support it. It could not be in the interest of the farmer class alone, for it would be of no benefit to the farmer except in times of general emergency, and then it would supply circulating money to relieve business paralysis and bless the whole country. In ordinary times he can get money from the banks on his cotton quicker and with less inconvenience to him. Of course, then he would not apply to the Government. But in times of general emergency, when the ordinary avenues of money are paralyzed for the want of circulation, this means could put money to flowing and the wheels of commerce in motion, and the paralysis would thereby be relieved.

You say this is populistic doctrine. I think not. I am surely not a Populist. I am a Democrat of Democrats. But if it were so, it should not therefore be rejected if it is good doctrine. No statesman should refuse wise legislation because it has the approval of his adversary.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] yesterday made an argument, not against the efficacy of cotton as security, for he said it is good security, but against the policy. That Senator always throws into his efforts his magnificent personality, his beautiful and forceful diction, and his eloquent delivery, as well as his splendid erudition and his profound ability. Add to these his thorough conscientiousness and his unswerving and loyal patriotism, and his devotion to the interests of all the country in general, and of his own State in particular, as is so well known and regarded by the Senate, and you can see how difficult it is for one so unskilled as I in polemics to answer any argument he may make, however unsound it may be. But I do not think the argument he made yesterday is sound.

It is said that the farmers who produce wheat will ask that wheat be made the predicate of the issuance of Treasury notes; that the tobacco and hemp growers, the landowners, the cattle raisers, the hog raisers, the horse breeders, and the miner of iron will ask that their property be taken as security for the issuance of Treasury notes if you resort to the issuance of Treasury notes upon cotton. This does not go to the argument of the efficiency or inefficiency of cotton as a security, because the Senator from Texas agrees with me that cotton is good security for the loan. I do not think if wheat, and tobacco, and hemp, and horses, and cattle, and hogs, and iron are not good securities for the issuance of Treasury notes, the farmers and miners who produce these commodities will object to the issuance of these notes in time of stringency upon cotton merely because they do not produce cotton. But whether they do or not, I do not think it good policy to refuse to advance on good security, because somebody who has no good security will ask for an advance on bad security.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How about coal?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think it is a good security; but I do not think that the producer of coal would object to cotton being made a predicate for the issuance of money if coal is not a good security and if cotton is.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Wherein is coal, particularly anthracite coal, not so good security as cotton?

Mr. McLAURIN. Because coal wastes in the handling of it; coal is destructible, and it is too cumbersome and in time of panic not convertible into money.

Wheat may have weevils in it. The stock may lie down and die. The iron may rust. The land can not be readily at all times converted into money, and the Government, when it issues notes, ought to issue them upon something that can be converted into money at once. That is my objection to the issuance of Treasury notes upon railroad bonds, because they can not always be converted into money.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then, let us take pig iron. Weevils do not affect pig iron.

Mr. McLAURIN. Rust does.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It affects the exterior of the pig iron. But pig-iron stores would probably be about as durable as cotton.

Mr. McLAURIN. Not at all; but if it were as durable, any other commodity that would be as efficacious as cotton as a security for the protection of the Government ought to be accepted. But I do not believe that iron would. It will rust.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course iron and steel are the most durable in price, and they are prime necessities in all civilized States, and in case of an emergency they would not have to be held long. Would the Senator think that rust would greatly depreciate the value of pig iron or steel during the time it had to be held for emergency currency, and that cotton would not depreciate?

Mr. McLAURIN. I think it would. I know it would not be nearly so good security as cotton, but if it were I would have no objection to making the loan upon iron. I am sure if it is as good as cotton it is far better than railroad bonds. Iron and steel would not be good to relieve a panic, because during such times you could not convert it into money at home nor abroad; whereas neither the calamity of war nor panics can stop the use of cotton or its sale, if it can be procured. The greater the stress of circumstances the greater the demand for cotton, and, of course, the better the price; and the better the price the better the security.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to ask my friend, the Senator from Mississippi, if he would be willing to class wool with cotton. I come from a State which produces a large quantity of wool, and the same arguments which make in favor of cotton would operate in favor of wool.

Mr. McLAURIN. They possibly would; and if wool is as good as cotton, then it would be a good thing upon which to predicate a loan—that is, if it is not liable to be corrupted by moths. I am sure that wool would not be as good security as cotton. This country does not produce wool sufficient for its own consumption; it raises enough cotton for the world.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So we have, then, cotton, wool, and iron.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think iron would do; it would rust and otherwise be unfit for such use.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I suggest to the Senator aluminum. It does not rust.

Mr. McLAURIN. Suppose we take gold.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why not silver?

Mr. McLAURIN. I think silver is the best money there is.

Mr. President, it is said that the money which would be issued upon all these commodities would be more than would be necessary for the emergency. So would the money that would be issued upon the United States, State, county, municipal, and railroad bonds be more than would be necessary for the emergency. The same objection would obtain to them. It is not proposed by the author of the bill, or of the substitute, that more money shall be issued than sufficient for the emergency, however superabundant the security.

Mr. President, whenever you assert or admit that the banks are the only medium of putting money into circulation you afford an argument for the issuance of bank notes, because if banks are the only medium of putting money into circulation you could not expect them to put any except their own money into circulation. But I deny the proposition that banks are the only medium of putting money into circulation. If the Government loans Jones a thousand dollars and he pays part of it on his debts, and buys clothing and other necessities and conveniences with part of it, and improves his farm with part of it, if he be a farmer, or makes other improvements, if he has other vocation, this money gets at once into circulation without the intervention of a bank, though in all probability the greater portion of it will get into the banks and from there be again put into circulation, wherein the banks will be serving a useful and beneficent purpose.

The bonds of the States are, many of them, and possibly all of them, equal in value to the bonds of the United States, and are just as certain of redemption, just as certain of payment as the bonds of the United States. But they can not be offset against the obligations to the United States, whereas the bonds of the United States Government can be offset against the obligations to the United States. If a person borrows from the United States a thousand dollars and holds the bond of the United States for a thousand dollars, one obligation can be made to offset the other if the emergency arises.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. BACON. I understand the contention of the Senator to be that bonds of the United States should furnish the only basis for an emergency currency. Am I correct? Is that the basis of the argument?

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes; I think when a United States bond is presented at the Treasury the Government ought to issue United States notes of its par value to the holder and cancel the bond.

Mr. BACON. The point I wish to call to the attention of the Senator in regard to that is that we have now within less than $200,000,000 of notes already issued as against the total amount of bonds against which they can be issued.

Mr. McLAURIN. I think it is $301,000,000.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator is mistaken. I have in my desk the Treasury figures, which I got from the Comptroller of the Currency. These are the figures as they existed probably six weeks ago. I do not suppose there has been any material change since then. Some six weeks ago the circulation as given me by the Comptroller of the Currency was $694,336,586. That was the amount of the national-bank circulation. The total amount of bonds outstanding available under any circumstances for circulation was $898,210,000, making something like $204,000,000 excess only.

Now, if the Senator would limit the emergency issue to such as could be based upon national bonds, he would necessarily limit the increase to that amount of some two hundred and odd million dollars, which, I understand, is recognized by all as insufficient if anything is to be done.

I desire to say to the Senator that I very gravely doubt the policy of the so-called "emergency currency," having a pretty strong conviction that there is enough money in the country if it can be confined to legitimate uses. But I do not wish to enter into any side argument on that subject. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that if he recognizes that an emergency currency is needed, and that that emergency currency should be to the extent, possibly, of $500,000,000, if the security for that emergency currency were limited, as the Senator contends it should be, to United States bonds, the volume of that emergency currency must necessarily be limited to some $200,000,000.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not agree with the Senator. I have not the figures before me, but my recollection is that they are $300,000,000. But upon the statement the Senator has made, that would leave something over $60,000,000 of the 10 per cent margin on the bonds that have already been predicated for the issuance of notes.

Mr. BACON. There is not any 10 per cent margin now. That law has been changed.

Mr. McLAURIN. When was it changed?

Mr. BACON. Two years ago. The banks are now authorized to receive currency up to the par value of the bonds.

Mr. McLAURIN. But they have not all done so.

Mr. BACON. That is another question. But they have all done this: What they have done is to issue notes to the extent of $694,336,586.

Mr. McLAURIN. And that was done only during the late panic.

Mr. BACON. That was the amount issued at the date of the communication I received from the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. McLAURIN. What is that date?

Mr. BACON. Since this bill has been introduced; this year.

Mr. McLAURIN. Very well. What was the issue on the 1st day of last October?

Mr. BACON. I have not that, but I simply state to the Senator that what I hold in my hand is authentic. I myself received it over the telephone from the Comptroller of the Currency, giving me the exact figures at that date, and whether the banks have issued up to the full amount or not, the amount which they issued at that date is the amount stated, $694,336,586, and the total amount they could have issued at that date was $898,210,050.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Both Senators are accurate from their different points of view. The Senator from Mississippi took the figures before the additional $94,000,000 of national-bank notes were taken out to meet the demands of the panic. The figures of the Senator from Georgia are as of a date after those notes were taken out, and that is why the discrepancy appears. Of course the notes that were taken out to meet the requirements of the panic are now being retired at the rate of $9,000,000 a month.

Mr. McLAURIN. They will be retired until the amount will return to $300,000,000, as I have said.

As I have stated before, I do not believe there is any great danger of any recurring panic if the banks of the entire country, and especially of New York City, because I think their delinquency was the cause of the late panic, will observe the law in the future. If they do not do so and defy the law, there will be no necessity for legislation, because no amount of issuance can prevent panics under such circumstances.

Now, I have said that I would confine it to United States bonds, not because, as I have said, I doubt the solvency of State bonds, county bonds, and municipal bonds, or railroad bonds, but because the Government, having the notes issued and the loan made upon United States bonds, can offset these bonds against the loan and there will be no necessity for liquidation. There can be no question about the solvency of the banks, so far as the circulation of their own notes is concerned, that issue money, and to that extent confidence is reposed in the deposits that are in the banks.

Mr. BACON. I quite understand the attitude of the Senator in that regard. I simply desired to call his attention to a practical difficulty growing out of the limited issue of United States bonds outstanding.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not see that that would be any difficulty, Mr. President. But in the event that State, county, municipal, and railroad bonds are to be made the predicate of loans, I would have that other security—cotton—that is better security than railroad bonds, as the predicate for these loans in time of panic. It would only be serviceable in time of panic, for in times of ordinary money circulation the cotton producer can get money on his cotton from anybody or bank who has money to loan, and there are plenty who have money to loan in such times.

Mr. BACON. I do not want to be misunderstood. I quite agree with the Senator, so far as railroad bonds are concerned. I would never agree to the issue of money upon the basis of railroad bonds as security or any other industrial bonds.

Mr. McLAURIN. When I say that in Government loans cotton is a better basis of security than all bonds except United States bonds, I do not mean to disparage the solvency of State, county, or municipal bonds, or railroad bonds for that matter, but I mean to say that in times of panic the cotton can be converted into money when no bond, not even a United States bond, can be converted into money; and the United States bond is better only because the obligation to the Government can be offset against the obligation of the Government. The Government being the obligor in one instance and the obligee in the other, the two can be offset, which can not be done with any other class of bonds on a Government loan.

It is said as an objection that none but a prosperous farmer could borrow money from the Government on cotton, because none but a prosperous farmer would have the cotton. I answer, neither could any banker but a prosperous one borrow from the Government, because none other would have the security. If the prosperous farmer borrows the money and puts it into circulation, it serves all who use money and stops the panic, and that is said to be the purpose of the bill.

However, the stage of the panic when it could have been advantageous to the public or profitable to the cotton producer to circulate money on cotton security is past. The discussion of the question is, for the present, mostly academic, and I have therefore touched it lightly. When I introduced the bill on the 9th day of December for the issuance of money upon United States bonds and upon cotton, I did not provide that cotton should be a permanent basis of credit for the issuance of notes, but for the purpose of relieving the then existing panic, and therefore I limited it to the 1st day of February, 1909. It can not be denied that if such law had been in existence on the 1st day of October there could not have been any panic, because $500,000,000 could have been put into circulation in less than ten days.

We are assured by Senators that the committee bill is not to help the bankers, but to get money into circulation when panic is threatened. So I give assurance that the bill I offered was not, primarily, to benefit the farmer alone, but to put money into circulation and relieve the people of the then existing panic, and thereby serve all who handle or use money; if while benefiting the entire country it incidentally helps the farmer, I am sure no reasonable man should grudge him such help.

When I propose that if the Government is to loan money to some of the national banks it shall loan to every other bank and to everybody else on the same kind and quality of security, I am told that no merchant but the prosperous merchant will have the bonds on which to base the loan. I answer, none but the banks that have the bonds can secure the loans; so the same argument would apply with equal force against loaning to national banks. All I ask is that the law be made to treat all on the same terms, and then, of course, they who can not furnish the security will not expect to secure a loan.

Should the crisis ever recur it is hoped what I have said may be found to have merit. I am sure if the measure I offered—that is, the advance of money to all alike on United States bonds and cotton—had, in a less crude form, been the law last September, there should not have been any panic, and the hundreds of thousands now unemployed would be earning good wages.

I limited the act, so far as cotton is concerned, to the 1st of next February, because of my confidence that the remedy would have dissipated the panic long ere that date; indeed, I would have been willing to limit the date to May 1 of this year. Inasmuch as this was for the purpose of dissipating the then existing panic, in the interest of all who operate money or are benefited by its operation, and not alone nor primarily in the interest of the cotton planter, and in the present and prospective conditions can not serve the same good purpose, and as the bill I introduced has not had the favorable consideration of the Finance Committee, I intend to only offer as an amendment to the committee bill that part of my bill which proposes that the Government in loaning money shall not restrict it to one class, but shall treat every citizen alike. There is no more reason for the Government to restrict its loans to the banks because they deal in money than confine the protection of its laws to lawyers because they deal in law.

That provision of my bill that offers to punish gambling in cotton futures is predicated on the right of Congress to protect its securities, and without the other provisions would impinge the Constitution. Of course I would not prohibit factories or anyone else from buying cotton to be delivered in the future. No lawmaker desires to make such law. But gambling in cotton futures is a different thing. That is, where there is no intention or expectation that cotton shall be delivered. It is a bet on one side that cotton will be higher in price and on the other side lower than a certain amount at a certain date. This is gambling in the sweat of the cotton producer.

Mr. President, I will trespass but little further upon the patience of the Senate. The banks do not need this legislation; I am inclined to think they do not want it, outside of New York and Chicago. The banks are prosperous. Every bank is interested in the integrity and stability of the banks of the country. They are operated by able, alert, active, and astute men, and generally patriotic men. Strike out of this bill all reference to State, municipal, and railroad bonds. It was the talk of these bonds that influenced me to offer cotton as at least an equally safe security. It is a security that can be readily converted into money in times of panic. Strike these bonds out and I will not insist on cotton. The farmer does not want any special legislation for him that militates against anybody else. All he asks is for laws that treat him as well as they treat others.

Put in the bill a plain provision that anyone who has Government bonds can go to the Treasury or subtreasury and have them cashed at any time and you have the question solved, as far as legislation can solve it. Great benefit can thereby come to the Government in saving millions of dollars paid as interest, and great advantage to the business of all alike.

CERTAIN LAND IN ANACOSTIA.

Mr. CARTER. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report an original bill and submit a report thereon. I ask that the bill be read the first time by its title and the second time at length.

The bill (S. 6047) repealing section 13 of the act approved March 2, 1907, entitled "An act amending an act entitled 'An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes,' and for other purposes," was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13 of an act entitled "An act amending an act entitled 'An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes,' and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1907, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I desire the special attention of the Senate to this particular measure. In order that its character may be understood I ask that the accompanying report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read in part the report submitted this day by Mr. CARTER, the entire report being as follows:

[Report to accompany S. 6047.]

The Committee on the District of Columbia, having had under consideration section 13 of an act of Congress commonly known as the "public building bill," approved March 2, 1907, and believing that the immediate repeal of that section is demanded by the public interest and to prevent the consummation of a fraud on the Government, herewith presents a bill providing for such repeal and recommend that the same do pass.

A correct understanding of this extraordinary section requires a brief review of certain transactions and enactments generally relating to the same subject-matter.

By an act of Congress approved March 19, 1904 (33 Stats., 143), the Secretary of War was authorized and directed to convey to Sidney Bieber, his heirs and assigns, "all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to all of a certain square of land in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia," stated in the act to be "known upon the plat or plan of said city as square numbered eleven hundred and thirty-one."

On the 26th day of July following the approval of that act, the Acting Secretary of War conveyed the square of land in question to said Sidney Bieber by a deed dated the 26th day of July, 1904, in consideration of $1,000, though the land thus conveyed was the property of the United States, located on the tide-water flats of the Anacostia River, and said to extend to and embrace a part of the Congressional Cemetery.

Bieber based his shadowy claim to the land upon what was manifestly a fraudulent transaction, whereby a person without title or claim of right deeded the land to one Mary E. Sweetzer, who, in due course, caused the same to be listed for taxation. Thereafter the property was held subject to nominal assessment and repeatedly sold for taxes until ultimately all the alleged outstanding tax titles were acquired by Sidney Bieber, and that enterprising gentleman thereafter set about to remove the clouds from his title, existing because of the paramount title of the United States.

The square referred to did not appear on any official map of the city of Washington, and consisted mainly of accretions occurring through deposits and recession of the waters of Anacostia River, the Government being the owner of all the abutting property. The act of Congress treated the paramount title as a cloud on what appears to have been a purely fictitious title. As to late acquisitions in the same locality, Mr. Bieber did not deem it necessary to even have a fictitious title to proceed upon, for we find that by section 21 of the public building bill, which was approved as an act June 30, 1906 (34 Stats., 772), it was provided:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant and convey unto Sidney Bieber and his heirs and assigns all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to all of certain land in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, lying south of squares Nos. 1123, 1148, and 1149, conforming with the metes and bounds of square No. 1131, and that part of square No. 1117 situated between the north lines of Water and I streets, the east line of Eighteenth street and the west line of Nineteenth street, when said streets are extended, upon the payment by the said Sidney Bieber into the Treasury of the United States of such sum of money as the said Secretary of War, upon consideration of all the circumstances, shall determine proper to be paid for the said squares; and the surveyor of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to mark out such areas, to record plats, and to designate the proper square numbers."

Under this last-named act the Acting Secretary of War did, on September 19, 1906, convey all the land described to Sidney Bieber for the sum of $3,903, which sum was held to be, upon consideration of all the circumstances, a proper sum to be paid to the United States for the land. By these two acts of Congress Mr. Bieber acquired blocks of land extending from the Congressional Cemetery to and including a portion of the elevated ground on the eastern shore of the Anacostia River. Under the last act there does not seem to have been any pretense of adverse title as against the United States, nor was there any doubt about the United States being the owner of the property conveyed.

As to all the property acquired by Mr. Bieber from the Government pursuant to the two acts of Congress referred to, the Government is without remedy, unless the conveyances to Bieber can be canceled through appropriate judicial proceedings. For reasons not stated, but apparently obvious, the name of Mr. Bieber does not appear in the section which the bill herewith reported proposes to repeal, but the language of the section leaves no doubt that he was the person intended to be immediately benefited by section 13 of the public building act approved March 2, 1907, which reads as follows:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to convey to the purchaser from the United States of square No. 1131, and the south part of square No. 1117, and the squares south of squares Nos. 1123, 1148, and 1149, in the city of Washington, all the interest of the United States in the land lying south of the squares so purchased and between them and the channel of the Anacostia River, upon the payment by such purchaser into the Treasury of the United States of such sum of money as the said Secretary of War, upon consideration of all the circumstances, shall determine proper to be paid for the said land; and the surveyor of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to mark out such land and determine the areas, and to record a plat thereof."

By this extraordinary section the Secretary of War is directed to convey to Mr. Sidney Bieber, who was the purchaser of the land described in the section, all the interest of the United States in squares lying south of the squares to which Mr. Bieber had acquired title in pursuance of the two preceding enactments. Such conveyance would substantially deprive the United States and the city of Washington of all the water front on the Anacostia River south of the north line of the Congressional Cemetery extended, and indeed it is not clear that the conveyance would not embrace a considerable portion of the ground upon which the Government Hospital for the Insane is located.

Fortunately the Secretary of War has not executed the deed required by the terms of this last-mentioned enactment, and the bill herewith reported is intended to repeal section 13, which directs the Secretary of War to make such conveyance. In the judgment of the committee, Congress is bound by imperative duty to exercise its full power to prevent the consummation of the fraudulent scheme underlying the subtile land-grabbing operation very clearly disclosed by the successive acts herein recited. As to the lands conveyed, Congress seems to be powerless, but the committee is investigating the subject and hopes to be able to make some recommendations in the premises at a later date.

That Congress could not have realized the true intent and purpose of the acts of 1904, 1906, and 1907, in so far as they related to this subject, is made quite clear by reference to previous and contemporaneous action of Congress with reference to the Anacostia River front.

By its joint resolution of April 11, 1898 (30 Stats., 738), Congress directed the Secretary of War to prepare and submit—

"a project for the improvement of the Anacostia River and the reclamation of its flats from the line of the District of Columbia to the mouth of said river, with an estimate of the cost of the same and a report on the area and ownership of the land to be reclaimed."

In December following the Secretary of War submitted to Congress the report of Lieut. Col. Charles L. Allen, Corps of Engineers, dated December 1, 1898, in which report is set forth at length the necessity for the improvement of the Anacostia River to secure—

"1. Access to the navy-yard.
"2. Increased facilities for commerce and navigation.
"3. Removal of unsanitary conditions."

The project was divided into three sections, as follows:
Section I. From the mouth to the Navy-Yard Bridge.
Section II. From Navy-Yard Bridge to Benning Bridge.
Section III. From Benning Bridge to the District line.

The cost of executing the project was estimated in detail, and the aggregate cost for sections I and II amounted to about $2,000,000.

In 1902 Congress appropriated $150,000 in addition to the sum of $20,000 theretofore allotted to this river improvement. The project as to work in progress provides for the improvement of that portion of the Anacostia River below the Navy-Yard Bridge by dredging a canal 24 feet deep for a width of 400 feet and depositing the dredged material on the adjacent flats to an average elevation of 7 feet above low tide, the reclaimed area to be surrounded by an earth embankment to a heigth of 14 feet above low tide, protected by a masonry sea wall and provided with suitable drainage, at an estimated cost of $1,218,525.

In 1905 the Chief of Engineers reported that—

"The improvement already made has been of benefit to navigation and has resulted in the diversion of considerable traffic from the Washington channel, where conditions were rapidly becoming congested."

In the same report the recommendation is made—

"that such land as is required for the improvement be acquired, and that all matters as to riparian rights and ownership of the reclaimed lands be settled by the condemnation and purchase of a strip of land adjacent to the shore, or otherwise, before the flats at these localities are reclaimed."

On July 31, 1905, Lieut. Col. Smith S. Leach, Corps of Engineers, reported that—

"The trade and commerce of Washington are increasing, while the wharf facilities along the Potomac front are inadequate for the present traffic and afford no room for expansion. The improvement of the Anacostia will give the needed additional wharfage facilities and will afford abundant anchorage facilities, which do not now exist in this vicinity."

Additional expenditures were made in 1906, and Capt. Spencer Cosby, Corps of Engineers, reports that in addition to the benefit to navigation the total expenditure on the project to that date had resulted in reclaiming about 460 acres of desirable land in addition to providing a channel 20 feet deep at mean low tide and of at least 300 feet wide (except at Buzzards Point, where the width is about 240 feet) for a distance of over 9,100 feet upstream from the mouth of Anacostia River—that is, up to about to the center of the navy-yard. Until the completion of Section I, the designed improvement of Sections II and III will not be attempted, particularly as far as dredging is concerned.

Again, on February 27, 1906, the House of Representatives' concurrent resolution No. 21 requires the Commissioners of the District of Columbia "to submit to Congress a report upon the improvement of the so-called 'flats' of the Anacostia River from its mouth to the District line, with recommendations and estimates of cost," and on June 21, 1906, the Commissioners' report (H. Ex. Doc. 903, 59th Cong., 1st sess.) makes favorable reference to the general project proposed in 1898 and suggests that—

"the subject of the treatment of the Anacostia River and flats was taken up by a commission appointed March 1, 1901, by the United States Senate, to report on a park system for the District of Columbia."

In the recommendations of the commission referred to (see S. Rept. 166, 57th Cong., 1st sess.) occurs this language:

"To offset this cost there will be in the commercial section a filling in of 600 or more acres of land, which, if the riparian rights are obtained, will belong to the United States, and can be utilized either as a park or sold for commercial use. This will offset to a considerable extent the cost of the project, and if it is leased will doubtless give an adequate return on the money spent."

The commission further recommends—

"that counsel be employed to investigate and determine the ownership of the land and riparian rights along the Anacostia River, and if ownership and rights can not be thus ascertained, that the Attorney-General be directed to bring suit for the purpose."

The Acting Attorney-General, in an opinion dated September 6, 1905, advised the Secretary of War that the title to lands embraced in the so-called "Anacostia flats" was derived from the same source as its title to what is known as the "Potomac flats," which has been judicially established. (See Morris v. United States, 174 U. S., 196.) The title of the Government rests upon the cession made by the act of the State of Maryland of December 23, 1788.

It is title to this valuable property that Mr. Sidney Bieber has sought to acquire, first by piecemeal and finally by wholesale through section 13, of the act approved March 2, 1907, which section the bill herewith presented is intended to repeal. It is inconceivable that Congress, while thus making large appropriations for the improvement of Anacostia River and the adjacent tide flats, and exhibiting solicitude for the acquisition of all interfering titles, should have intentionally directed the Secretary of War to convey to Mr. Sidney Bieber or anyone else substantially all its title to such tidelands.

The record of the debates in both Houses of Congress shows that the subject of such proposed conveyance was not considered or understood, but on the contrary it appears that the act of 1907 was intended merely to correct a number of errors in the legislation had at the last session.

It was alleged on the floor of the House that the bill made no appropriation and that all changes provided for were within the limits of cost theretofore fixed. A Member having the bill in charge on the floor of the House, in reply to a question by Mr. TAWNEY, made this statement:

"There is not one dollar's worth of new construction, nor is there a foot of ground authorized, but in some cases it was necessary to transfer from the appropriation made for the building to the appropriation made for the site, because an additional small amount was necessary to procure the site which the people wanted."

Nowhere was any suggestion made that the bill contained a section directing the Secretary of War to convey to a stranger the title of the United States to valuable tidelands in the District of Columbia then being improved at large expense to the Government.

Before the reading was concluded—

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the remainder of the report be printed in the RECORD. In order to obviate the necessity of further reading, I will make a brief statement of the facts in this case.

To begin with, I regard the successive enactments as the most extraordinary that ever passed Congress within my knowledge. In 1904 a bill was passed apparently to cure a defect or remove a cloud upon a title to a block of land in the Congressional Cemetery and said to embrace a part of the cemetery itself. This alleged cloud really consisted of the paramount and undisputed title of the United States to the land, but it was called a cloud because, forsooth, many years before an individual who had no right, shadow, or claim of title deeded the property to a certain lady mentioned in the report, Mrs. Sweetzer. I think. Mrs. Sweetzer defaulted in payment of taxes after having listed the property for taxation. Strange to say, this property of the United States was sold by the District of Columbia for taxes, repeatedly thereafter sold, and finally became the property of Mr. Sidney Bieber. Mr. Sidney Bieber proceeded to remove the cloud on his tax title, and Congress passed an act providing that the Secretary of War should deed the block in question to Mr. Bieber for such consideration as, considering all the circumstances, seemed to be just.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The subsequent transactions that the Senator from Montana will doubtless call attention to have no relation to the Committee on the District of Columbia, but as the original bill came from the House of Representatives to the Committee on the District of Columbia and was reported from that committee, with the Senator's permission, I should like to make a very brief statement concerning it.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill, as the Senator suggests, was ostensibly for the purpose of removing a cloud from the title.

Mr. TELLER. We can not hear the Senator on this side, and it is a matter of some importance, I think.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I will speak a little louder. The bill, as the Senator from Montana suggests, was represented to be for the purpose of removing a cloud from the title to a block of land on the Anacostia Flats, almost entirely, as I recall it, under water.

It provided that the United States Government, which seemed to have some claim to the land (it was pretty difficult to ascertain the exact ownership of it), might for a consideration to be agreed upon execute a deed and place the property in the possession of Mr. Bieber, he, as I remember the matter, holding tax titles to it. The bill was referred, as I recall it, and I think I speak authoritatively, to the War Department, and a report came back saying that the Department saw no objection to the passage of the bill. Upon that assurance from the War Department the bill was reported from the committee and became a law.

Subsequently the Department conveyed the land to Mr. Bieber, receiving about $1,000 compensation for the property. So far as the passage of that bill is concerned the Committee on the District of Columbia is somewhat responsible for it, but no member of that committee had the least conception at the time that there was anything irregular or improper in the transaction. I am not well advised now as to whether there was or not. There is a great deal of property in the District of Columbia concerning which the title is in controversy, and I think this particular square of ground would come under that head. It had been sold for taxes, and two or three different persons, as I recall it, had at various times tax title to it. The committee acted in entire good faith, as the Senator from Montana, of course, will readily understand, and the transaction became a fact, and the property was transferred to Mr. Bieber.

The subsequent transactions the Senator from Montana will doubtless recount, but they have no relation whatever to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask some member of the committee if there is any charge of misconduct on the part of the man who got title under the first act?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have never heard it alleged.

Mr. TELLER. What was the necessity of the second measure?

Mr. GALLINGER. The second and the third transactions were consummated through a provision in a public buildings bill, coming from the other House, and concerning which the Committee on the District of Columbia knew nothing, and I apprehend the Senate knew very little, if anything at all, about it.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me the difficulty we are met with here is that the Government has already by an act conveyed this property to a man.

Mr. GALLINGER. It conveyed, I will say to the Senator, one square and then subsequently one or two further squares, but by legislation on a public-buildings bill title was given to the same person for a much larger quantity of land, and that has been held up. It is to prevent the transfer of that property that this bill has been reported.

Mr. TELLER. On that he has not paid anything.

Mr. GALLINGER. He has not paid anything. The War Department has held it up. I think the Pennsylvania Railroad became a party to the controversy on the claim that the road had some interest in the property. The Senator from Montana knows more about that than I do.

Mr. TELLER. And this is only to repeal an act that has not been put in operation?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the purpose.

Mr. TELLER. There can not be any harm done to this man who claims this ground? I would not like to say that we could legislate that title out of him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no; that is not intended.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the first bill, that of 1904, passed, as the Senator from New Hampshire said, the report of the House committee being adopted merely in the Senate. The bill passed in a pro forma manner, under the general impression that a shadow or a cloud existed on the title, that the bill was intended to remove.

Somewhat encouraged by the success of that operation, Mr. Bieber proceeded, through a section of the public-building bill of 1906, to have the Secretary of War directed to convey to him, I think, four other squares, reaching across the Anacostia River to its eastern shore. In due course of time the Assistant Secretary of War executed the deed, so that Mr. Bieber thus became, as the grantee of the United States, the owner of a succession of blocks extending from the Congressional Cemetery, and said to include a part of it, over to and including some of the shore on the eastern side of the river. That deed is now of record and the jurisdiction of Congress over the subject-matter has ceased.

But Mr. Bieber, in 1907, returned and procured the insertion of section 13 in the public-building bill, which directs the Secretary of War to convey to the purchaser of these five blocks all of the land owned by the United States south of it, which would embrace all of the tide flats of the Anacostia River south of these blocks practically down to and including the landing at the navy-yard. According to the broad language of the section, Mr. Bieber could, I think, demand a conveyance of a strip of ground extending through the grounds of the National Hospital for the Insane.

The Government, contemporaneous with this line of proceeding, was arranging on a large scale a scheme for the improvement of this identical ground and for the deepening and widening of the channel of the Anacostia River from its entrance to the Potomac to the District line. A large sum of money was expended during these years upon that channel. It has been widened to 400 feet, or thereabouts, and a depth of 20 feet of water has been obtained up to and somewhat above the navy-yard. Over 400 acres of land of great value, with the riparian rights attached, have been reclaimed in the process of that improvement.

This conveyance, which the Secretary of War has not made, but is by law directed to make, would deprive the Government of a goodly portion of the property it has reclaimed, and transfer to an individual, who has neither shadow of claim nor right, this property, which, in due course of time, will become of very great value.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana will kindly suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid aside informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Montana will proceed.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana a question. Do I understand the object of the bill to be simply to repeal the act authorizing the Secretary of War to make a conveyance which he has not yet made?

Mr. CARTER. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. It does not cover more than that?

Mr. CARTER. No; I draw attention especially to the bill because it discloses a very great peril to public property in this District. It would be impossible to procure title to property 2,000 or 3,000 miles from here on the public domain in any such irregular manner. There would be special agents, and properly special agents, to protect the public domain; but this transaction indicates that any individual may convey to another the very ground on which this Capitol stands, and thereupon the District assessor will place the land on the assessment books subject to assessment, and if the taxes are not paid will sell the property for taxes. Any other square in the city may be encumbered and clouded as to title in precisely the same manner in which this operation was carried into effect.

One of the things connected with the transaction that is somewhat alarming rests in this: While this legislation inadvertently passed through Congress, an executive officer did not hesitate before carrying the act into effect a sufficient length of time to admonish Congress of the nature and effect of the law if carried out. Two former deeds were made very promptly, considering the manner in which departmental business is conducted, after the law was passed. I sincerely trust that this lesson may be of sufficient force to restrain the assessor of the District of Columbia or the Commissioners having its affairs in charge from permitting anyone to list the public property of the United States in the District of Columbia for assessment.

In the case of the section which it is proposed to repeal the Secretary of War has faltered. He appointed a commission to examine the ground and ascertain its value and then referred the bill to the Attorney-General for the purpose of ascertaining whether under all the conditions he was bound to convey the land as prescribed by the act of Congress. Because of these delays on the part of the Secretary of War the title of the United States to this valuable property has been preserved to the Government.

I can see no objection to the repeal of the law, and it appears quite manifest that duty requires that it should be repealed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I omitted to state when on my feet a moment ago that the second transaction to which the Senator from Montana has called attention was presented to the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee did not agree to report the bill and it became a law through a provision on the public-buildings bill, which came from another body.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If no amendment be proposed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CROW RESERVATION LANDS IN MONTANA.

Mr. DIXON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4793) authorizing settlers on Crow Reservation lands in Montana to mortgage same for the construction of irrigation systems prior to final proof.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 3, after the word "That," to strike out "all settlers" and insert "any settler;" in line 9, after the word "who," to strike out "have" and insert "has;" and in line 10, after the word "who," to strike out "have" and insert "has;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any settler under the homestead laws of the United States on the portion of the ceded lands of the Crow Indian Reservation in the State of Montana, which was opened to settlement under act of Congress of April 27, 1904, and President's proclamation dated May 24, 1906, who has entered said lands previous to January 1, 1908, and who has established or shall hereafter establish residence on said land, shall be entitled to patent for the land so entered upon the payment to the local land officers of the usual and customary fees and the balance remaining unpaid on the purchase price of said lands. It shall be lawful for any such entryman to make and enter into an agreement with any irrigating company or other person or corporation for the purpose of borrowing money for the payment of the purchase price of said lands and all fees due the Government and for the cost of an irrigating system for said lands or other improvements necessary for the use of said lands for farming purposes, or for all of these purposes. Said entryman may make and execute a mortgage upon the lands so entered for the amount of any such loan and file the same in the local land office and deposit with the receiver the amount due the Government, and the mortgagee shall have a lien upon the premises from the time and after which the mortgage is so filed. It is expressly intended hereby to authorize the execution of a mortgage on the land before the issuance of receiver's receipt or patent, but nothing herein shall operate to divest the Government of its claim and lien for all moneys due the Government under the entry.

Mr. TELLER. While I am familiar in a general way with the purpose of the bill, I do not suppose I know all the facts, and I should like to have the Senator from Montana state just what the bill proposes to accomplish.

Mr. DIXON. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Colorado, I will say that these lands were opened to settlement four years ago. They lie in the northern part of the present Crow Reservation. They were opened under the homestead law, but the settlers were to pay, under the terms of the act, $4.50 an acre to the Crow Indians, the Government merely acting as trustee in the disposal of the lands.

Mr. TELLER. They were Indian lands?

Mr. DIXON. They were Indian lands, which the Government held as a trustee. The settlers were to pay $4.50 an acre. The supposition was that a Government irrigation canal would cover the land thus occupied. A number of settlers went in there on arid lands, upon which they could not make a living unless the land was irrigated. They paid a dollar an acre as the first purchase money. The remaining $3.50 per acre was to be paid in five annual installments. They have negotiated with three or four ditch companies to construct a canal to irrigate the land, but the question has invariably arisen that they can not give any kind of a title so that the irrigation company will be secured.

They sent a committee here a few months ago and we talked with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs suggested this proposed legislation, which, in effect, gives any irrigation company that will contract to dig the ditch the right to go in and make the payments in advance, which the Indians would not otherwise get before the lapse of from one to five years. The Indians will get a part of their money five years ahead of time, the irrigation company furnishing the money to commute the proof and taking a mortgage on the land. The homes of about 540 settlers, as has been represented to me, are involved in this measure.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL LANDS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FLINT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9205) to make the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1891, (26 Stats., p. 796), applicable to the Territory of New Mexico.

The Secretary read the bill and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand the purpose of the bill is to permit the Territory of New Mexico to select lands in lieu of certain sections reserved to the Territory for school purposes. Is that the purpose of the bill?

Mr. FLINT. The purpose of the bill is to permit the Territory of New Mexico to select lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections that were selected or disposed of prior to the act granting them to the Territory.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to ask the Senator from California whether those lands were granted to the Territory of New Mexico or only reserved, as was the case, I think, with most of the Territories.

Mr. FLINT. I will say to the Senator that the lands were granted, and the bill simply places the Territory of New Mexico on the same plane as the other States of the Union.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It was an absolute grant, and not a mere reservation?

Mr. FLINT. Yes, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3970) to revise and amend the statutes relating to patents.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Patents with amendments.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this bill seems to provide for a pretty general change of the statutes heretofore in existence relating to patents. It is utterly impossible for anybody who is even familiar with the patent business to determine from hearing it read whether this bill ought to become a law. I should like to know something more about it. I do not like to object to a bill which a Senator thinks ought to be passed, but I want to know something about the court of appeals for which the bill proposes to provide, what its jurisdiction is to be, and how we are to get rid of it if we find we made a mistake in creating it. These matters are not clearly defined in the bill, and I shall be compelled to object to it unless an explanation is made. I should like to hear the Senator explain the bill, and I reserve my objection until I hear what he has to say about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will state that the bill itself is recommended by the Patent Office. In their recommendation they make the statement which I shall read in support of the bill as reported. The Committee on Patents have had the bill under consideration; they have gone over it very carefully, and it is the unanimous report of the committee that the bill should pass. The Commissioner of Patents says:

The proposed amendments to sections 482, 4894, 4904, 4909, 4910, 4914, 4915, and 4934 of the Revised Statutes, relating to patents, relate to appeals in this office. Under the present patent law appeal lies in ex parte cases from a primary examiner to the board of examiners in chief, thence to the Commissioner (or Assistant Commissioner), and from his decision to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and in interference cases the course of appeals from decisions of the examiner of interferences is the same, there being three appeals in each case.

The purpose of the proposed amendment to the statute is to shorten the course of prosecution by the elimination of one of the appeals within the Office. This is designed to be accomplished by combining the Commissioner, Assistant Commissioner, and examiners in chief into a single appellate tribunal, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which all appeals shall lie, whether from a primary examiner or from the examiner of interferences, and from which appeals would lie to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia. The present course of appeals is not well adapted to the volume of business which the Office is now called upon to handle for the following reasons:

1. It imposes on applicants an unnecessary amount of delay and expense. The very purpose of the patent system is to place at the service of the public at as early a date as practicable inventions as they are made, and unnecessary delays affect not only applicants but all interested in the industries to which the invention relates. One appeal within the Office, together with the appeal to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, would seem to be ample, especially in view of the fact that in a suit on a patent a single appeal takes the case from the trial court to the court of appeals. The elimination of one appeal would materially shorten the time required for the ultimate disposal of appealed cases, and effect a considerable saving of expense to applicants.

2. Section 4910 provides for an appeal to the Commissioner in person from the board of examiners in chief. The work of the Office and the consequent number of appeals have increased to such an extent that it has become difficult and will soon be impossible for the Commissioner to give to each case the amount of personal attention proper to its disposal.

3. The board of examiners in chief as at present constituted consists of three members, and no provision is made under the present law to supply a temporary vacancy caused by sickness or absence from other cause of any of the members. The absence of one member often results in an evenly divided board, with the consequent necessity for a rehearing, and the absence of two members causes an entire suspension of business. With the proposed membership of five, the presence of a quorum of three would be practically assured at all times, which has not been the case in numerous instances in the past, owing to frequent absences of a member of the board on account of periods of illness of greater or less duration, and also by reason of annual leave and other causes.

The Office charge for appeals from the examiners to the examiners in chief under the existing law is $10, and from the examiners in chief to the Commissioner is $20. The amendment to section 4934, which provides for fees in patent cases, cancels these two provisions and fixes the fee for appeals from the examiners to the proposed board of appeals at $15.

In other words, Mr. President, if the bill becomes a law it eliminates one court of appeals in the Patent Office. As stated by the Commissioner of Patents in his letter, there is one appeal from the examiner to the examiners in chief, and from the three examiners in chief there is an appeal to the Commissioner or the Assistant Commissioner, and then an appeal from the Commissioner or the Assistant Commissioner to the court of appeals in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TELLER. It leaves that just as it is now?

Mr. SMOOT. It leaves that just as it is now. It simply means the cutting out of one appeal in the Patent Office—that is, instead of having two appeals there will be one appeal to a court consisting of five instead of three members.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CARTER. I observe that section 1 of the bill varies somewhat from any kind of legislation with which we are familiar. It provides:

That section 482 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting in line 1, after the word "The," the words "Commissioner of Patents, the Assistant Commissioner of Patents, and the," etc.

Later on I notice that the language follows "so that the section so amended will read as follows"—

This preliminary section contains matter which I think would be better embodied in a report to accompany the bill. I can not understand the need of encumbering the statute with the suggestion that words be inserted here and there in a section which is afterwards given in full as it will appear when amended. I suggest to the Senator from Utah the propriety of striking out section 1 entirely. A very cursory reading of it will show how unusual that section will be to the person who undertakes to consult the statute.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KEAN. That runs all the way through the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] had the statute before him, he would notice that section 1 in this bill states just what words are to be changed in the statute and then recites that the section of the Revised Statutes, when changed as provided in section 1, will "read as follows."

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the suggestion of the point where these insertions are to be made and then reciting the statute as it will read when amended seems to be needlessly doubling up the work and tends to confusion rather than to elucidation. Why not say that "sections so-and-so shall be, and are hereby, amended so as to read as follows," leaving out the process by which you insert and strike out various words here and there in the course of the section? I think that a statement of the changes might properly be contained in the report, in order to show where the amendments were made, but ought not, I think, to be incorporated as a part of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I have said, there is virtually nothing in section 1 but a recital of the changes made. I have no objection whatever to having section 1 amended as suggested by the Senator from Montana, so as to provide:

That section 482 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

Mr. GALLINGER. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that if section 1 is so amended, the other sections ought to be amended likewise. The same objection would lie to the other sections.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that he can avoid the recapitulation of this phrase providing for the amendment by simply saying that the sections, naming them all, "shall be amended so as to read as follows," and thus avoid stating in the bill the words inserted and stricken out in the sections of the Revised Statutes, which it is proposed to amend.

Mr. SMOOT. That question never was discussed in the committee. I will state, however, that in talking with the Commissioner of Patents he said that he thought the bill should pass as it is now, but I myself do not see why it should not be amended as suggested by the Senator from Montana, so that it will simply say that the sections referred to "shall read as follows."

Mr. CARTER. I think that would be a very great improvement on the form of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the suggestion of the Senator from Montana shall prevail, it seems to me that the word "respectively" ought to be inserted, so that it will read that the sections which are named shall be amended "so as to read as follows, respectively," thereby making it apparent that the certain section that is to be amended is in order as enumerated by the numerals in the first section of the bill as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well. Before the amendments suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] are proposed, however, there are some committee amendments which I ask may be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the Committee on Patents will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, after line 9, it is proposed to strike out:

Second. Appeals which are now vested in the court of appeals of the District of Columbia from the decisions of the Commissioners of Patents will hereafter be taken from the decisions of the board of appeals.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Patents was, on page 5, after line 13, to insert:

SEC. 6. That section 4913 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended by substituting for the word "his" before the word "decision," in line 9 thereof, the word "the," so that the section as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 4913. The court shall, before hearing such appeal, give notice to the Commissioner of the time and place of the hearing, and on receiving such notice the Commissioner shall give notice of such time and place in such manner as the court may prescribe, to all parties who appear to be interested therein. The party appealing shall lay before the court certified copies of all the original papers and evidence in the case, and the Commissioner shall furnish the court with the grounds of the decision, fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal. And at the request of any party interested, or of the court, the Commissioner and the examiners may be examined under oath, in explanation of the principles of the thing for which a patent is demanded."

Mr. SMOOT. In view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] and the changes it will necessitate, I move to amend that amendment by striking out:

SEC. 6. That section 4913 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended by substituting for the word "his" before the word "decision," in line 9 thereof, the word "the," so that the section as amended shall read as follows:

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, in conformity with the suggestion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, section 1, line 3, after the word "That," it is proposed to strike out "section" and insert "sections;" in the same line, after the words "four hundred and eighty-two," to insert "4894, 4904, 4909, 4910, 4913, 4914, 4915, and 4934;" in line 4, after the word "same," to strike out "is" and insert "are;" in the same line, after the word "amended," to strike out:

By inserting in line 1, after the word "The," the words "Commissioner of Patents, the Assistant Commissioner of Patents, and the;" and in line 2, after the word "ability," by inserting the words "and they shall constitute a board of appeals, any three of whom, upon designation by the Commissioner, shall constitute a quorum;" and in line 7 by striking out the word "they" and inserting, after the word "Commissioner," the words "the board of appeals," and in the last line, after the word "them," by adding the words "In addition to the restrictions upon officers and employees of the Patent Office, provided in section 480 of the Revised Statutes, that they shall not acquire or take, directly or indirectly, any right or interest in any patent issued by the Office, the members of said board of appeals shall not be engaged in any other business, avocation, or employment, and may be removed from office at any time by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office."

On page 2, line 10, after the word "the," to strike out "section" and insert "sections;" in the same line, after the word "shall," to insert "respectively;" on page 3, after line 6, to strike out:

SEC. 2. That section 4894 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended by substituting for the words "Commissioner of Patents," in the next to the last line thereof, the words "board of appeals," so that the section so amended will read as follows:

On the same page, after line 20, to strike out:

SEC. 3. That section 4904 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended by striking out all after the word "examiner," in line 10, and substituting in lieu thereof the words "within such time, not less than twenty days, as the Commissioner shall prescribe, or from the decision of the board of appeals, as the case may be," so that the section so amended will read as follows:

On page 4, after line 14, to strike out:

SEC. 4. That section 4909 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended by erasing therefrom the words "examiners in chief" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "appeals," so that the section so amended will read as follows:

At the top of page 5 to strike out:

SEC. 5. That section 4910 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended by repealing the entire section and substituting therefor the following:

On page 6, after line 7, to strike out:

SEC. [6]7. That section 4914 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended by substituting in line 4 the words "board of appeals" for the word "Commissioner," so that the section so amended will read as follows:

At the top of page 7 to strike out:

SEC. [7]8. That section 4915 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended by canceling the words "either by the Commissioner of Patents or by the Supreme Court," in lines 2 and 3, and substituting in lieu thereof the words "by the court of appeals;" and in line 4 canceling the word "Commissioner" and substituting the words "board of appeals," so that the section so amended will read as follows:

And at the top of page 8 to strike out:

SEC. [8] 9. That section 4934 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended by canceling the following paragraphs:

"On an appeal for the first time from the primary examiners to the examiners in chief, $10.

"On every appeal from the examiners in chief to the Commissioner, $20."

And substituting in lieu thereof:

"On an appeal for the first time from the primary examiners to the board of appeals, $15," so that the section so amended shall read as follows.

So as to make the bill read:

That sections 482, 4894, 4904, 4909, 4910, 4913, 4914, 4915, and 4934 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, amended so that the sections shall, respectively, read as follows:

"SEC. 482. The Commissioner of Patents, the Assistant Commissioner of Patents, and the examiners in chief shall be persons of competent legal knowledge and scientific ability, and they shall constitute a board of appeals, any three of whom, upon designation by the Commissioner, shall constitute a quorum, whose duty it shall be, on the written petition of the appellant, to revise and determine upon the validity of the adverse decisions of examiners upon applications for patents, and for reissue of patents, and in interference cases; and when required by the Commissioner the board of appeals shall hear and report upon claims for extensions and perform such other like duties as he may assign them. In addition to the restrictions upon officers and employees of the Patent Office, provided in section 480 of the Revised Statutes, that they shall not acquire or take, directly or indirectly, any right or interest in any patent issued by the Office, the members of said board of appeals shall not be engaged in any other business, avocation, or employment, and may be removed from office at any time by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office."

"SEC. 4894. All applications for patents shall be completed and prepared for examination within one year after the filing of the application, and in default thereof, or upon failure of the applicant to prosecute the same within one year after any action therein, of which notice shall have been given to the applicant, they shall be regarded as abandoned by the parties thereto, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the board of appeals that such delay was unavoidable.

"SEC. 4904. Whenever an application is made for a patent which, in the opinion of the Commissioner, would interfere with any pending application, or with any unexpired patent, he shall give notice thereof to the applicants, or applicant and patentee, as the case may be, and shall direct the primary examiner to proceed to determine the question of priority of invention. And the Commissioner may issue a patent to the party who is adjudged the prior inventor, unless the adverse party appeals from the decision of the primary examiner within such time, not less than twenty days, as the Commissioner shall prescribe, or from the decision of the board of appeals, as the case may be.

"SEC. 4909. Every applicant for a patent or for the reissue of a patent, any of the claims of which have been twice rejected, and every party to an interference, may appeal from the decision of the primary examiner or of the examiner in charge of interferences in such case, to the board of appeals, having once paid the fee for such appeal.

"SEC. 4910. If any such party is dissatisfied with the decision of the board of appeals he may appeal to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, in the manner now provided by law for appeals to said court from the decisions of the Commissioner of Patents.

"SEC. 4913. The court shall, before hearing such appeal, give notice to the Commissioner of the time and place of the hearing, and on receiving such notice the Commissioner shall give notice of such time and place in such manner as the court may prescribe, to all parties who appear to be interested therein. The party appealing shall lay before the court certified copies of all the original papers and evidence in the case, and the Commissioner shall furnish the court with the grounds of the decision, fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal. And at the request of any party interested, or of the court, the Commissioner and the examiners may be examined under oath, in explanation of the principles of the thing for which a patent is demanded."

"SEC. 4914. The court, on petition, shall hear and determine such appeal, and revise the decision appealed from in a summary way, on the evidence produced before the board of appeals, at such early and convenient time as the court may appoint, and the revision shall be confined to the points set forth in the reasons of appeal. After hearing the case, the court shall return to the Commissioner a certificate of its proceedings and decision, which shall be entered of record in the Patent Office and shall govern the further proceedings in the case. But no opinion or decision of the court in any such case shall preclude any person interested from the right to contest the validity of such patent in any court wherein the same may be called in question.

"SEC. 4915. Whenever a patent on application is refused by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia upon appeal from the board of appeals, the applicant may have remedy by bill in equity, and the court having cognizance thereof, on notice to adverse parties and other due proceedings had, may adjudge that such applicant is entitled, according to law, to receive a patent for his invention, as specified in his claim, or for any part thereof, as the facts in the case may appear. And such adjudication, if it be in favor of the right of the applicant, shall authorize the Commissioner to issue such patent on the applicant filing in the Patent Office a copy of the adjudication, and otherwise complying with the requirements of law. In all cases where there is no opposing party a copy of the bill shall be served on the Commissioner; and all the expenses of the proceeding shall be paid by the applicant, whether the final decision is in his favor or not."

"SEC. 4934. The following shall be the rates for patent fees:

"On filing each original application for a patent, except in design cases, $15.

"On issuing each original patent, except in design cases, $20.

"In design cases: For three years and six months, $10; for seven years, $15; for fourteen years, $30.

"On filing each caveat, $10.

"On every application for the reissue of a patent, $30.

"On filing each disclaimer, $10.

"On every application for the extension of a patent, $50.

"On the granting of every extension of a patent, $50.

"On an appeal for the first time from the primary examiners to the board of appeals, $15.

"For certified copies of patents and other papers, including certified printed copies, 10 cents per hundred words.

"For recording every assignment, agreement, power of attorney, or other paper of 300 words or under, $1; of over 300 and under 1,000 words, $2; of over 1,000 words, $3.

"For copies of drawings, the reasonable cost of making them."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect July 1, 1908, but shall not apply to any case in which the appeal to the examiners in chief was taken prior to that date. In such case the appeal shall be taken to, and determined by, the board of examiners in chief, the Commissioner of Patents, and the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, as the case may be, as provided by law prior to July 1, 1908.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, perhaps I would be asking too much at the present time if I should ask to have the other bills concerning the Patent Office now considered. They all relate to the same subject-matter as the bills just passed.

Mr. KEAN. There are four or more bills on the Calendar relating to the Patent Office.

Mr. SMOOT. There are four.

Mr. KEAN. If they are as well drawn as the last one, I think we had better let them go over.

Mr. SMOOT. They are not so long. They simply make provision for the changes in the law which have been made by the bill which has just passed, so as to make them all correspond.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business pretty early this afternoon, and if the other bills are to be pressed for action I think I will make the motion now.

Mr. SMOOT. I withdraw my request for the consideration at this time of the bills to which I referred.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator does not intend to take up much time, I will yield.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 9) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a condemned cannon to the board of regents of the University of South Dakota, at Vermillion, S. Dak., to be placed on the campus of said institution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 11, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 10, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PEARL HARBOR, HAWAII.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask a reprint of the bill (H. R. 18120) to establish a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, and accompanying report No. 1132.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, reference of the bill (S. 558) to authorize a patent to be issued to Annie Ward, formerly Annie Brown, for certain lands therein described, was changed from the Committee on Private Land Claims to the Committee on the Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4645. An act to authorize the Minnesota and Manitoba Railroad Company to convey certain lands granted to it by the act of Congress approved April 17, 1900.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 43.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made of Portsmouth Harbor, in the State of New Hampshire, with a view to obtaining slack-water navigation therein by the construction of a dam, and to submit estimates for the same.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills and resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2736. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building in the city of Lagrange, Ga.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 4030. An act to fix the pay of the Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2732. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building in the city of Cordele, Ga.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 4645. An act to authorize the Minnesota and Manitoba Railroad Company to convey certain lands granted to it by the act of Congress approved April 17, 1900—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. R. 28. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to donate certain cannon, with their accessories, to the State of New Hampshire—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Senate concurrent resolution 43.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made of Portsmouth Harbor, in the State of New Hampshire, with a view to obtaining slack-water navigation therein by the construction of a dam, and to submit estimates for the same—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 2429. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain and other wars, and to the widows of such soldiers and sailors.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 18347, the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18347, the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON]. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. As bearing upon the President's last message, I venture with some diffidence to submit some observations upon the reasons, principles, and limitations involved in the governmental regulation of persons in their occupations.

Sir, the last quarter of the eighteenth century was an age not only of political but of industrial revolution, in which France broke down the walls of feudalism, the thirteen colonies became the United States, and Watt's discovery of steam revolutionized the industrial world and introduced the new rule of mechanical force.

Since that time, from Watt's discovery of steam down to the latest discovery in electricity, there has been a continuous evolution of mechanical achievement, as a result of which small trades have given place to gigantic factories, located at commercial centers, connected by railroads, steamboats, telegraphs, and telephones, and the single brain of James Watt has become "the biggest wage fund that has risen in the world." [Applause.]

The world has moved on from sails to steam and from steam to electricity; from the stage coach to the transcontinental railroad; from the sickle to the harvester; from spinning wheels to power looms; from tallow dips to electric lights; from carrier pigeons to wireless telegraphy; from the anvil and the forge to the chimney retort and crucible of the most progressive age since time began. [Applause.]

The ocean cable and land telegraph systems of the world, supplemented by the telephone, have strung cities, towns, farms, factories, and mines like ganglia upon an international nerve system, and in some inscrutable way ethereal energy has lately been translated into human speech by wireless telegraphy.

A man may travel around the world now in less time than it would have taken Herodotus to travel the length of the Mediterranean, and I can send a message from this Capitol around the world within an hour, across lands redeemed from barbarism, through cities equipped with every luxury and convenience, and yet the ideal land of human happines is still an undiscovered country.

MACHINERY AND CORPORATIONS.

Sir, upon the dial plate of nations the centuries are the hours, and in the century hour of our national existence, since Robert Fulton launched the Clermont on the Hudson, we have increased from a population of about seven millions to a population of eighty-seven millions.

Of these eighty-seven millions, twenty-nine millions are engaged in so-called "gainful occupations," and of these twenty-nine millions engaged in so-called "gainful occupations" ten millions are engaged in agriculture, seven millions in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits, five millions in trade and transportation, and seven millions in professional and domestic service, and all are interdependent.

The prosperity or adversity of one of these divisions of people engaged in "gainful occupations" involves the prosperity not only of all the other divisions, but of all the people.

Sir, things once fundamental, elementary, or entirely nonexistent have become complex, powerful, dominant.

When Blackstone wrote his Commentaries and defined corporations, some ten years before the American Revolution, he could have had no more idea of the possibilities of corporate evolution than Watt could have had of the possibilities of the steam that lifted the lid of the teakettle, or than Franklin could have had of the possibilities of the electricity that flashed down his kite string.

The United States, the States within the United States, and the municipalities and corporations within the States and the United States have become one tremendous aggregation of independent human activity, whose powers and possibilities no statistician can possibly estimate.

Partnerships have become limited partnerships, corporations, and combinations of corporations, engaged in all kinds of business and running all kinds of factories.

And these factories have developed an aggregate of 15,000,000 horsepower, equivalent to the power of 90,000,000 men; and these 90,000,000 iron men, who do not appear in any census list, but have to be reckoned with in our political economy, managed, supervised, and vitalized by 7,000,000 men of flesh and blood, have forged, shaped, and spun the dreams of inventors into shapes fit for use and luxury.

They have built their own workshops, mined their own coal, and generated their own electricity.

They have framed tall buildings with tops in the clouds, spun spider webs of steel across rivers and gorges, and forged and hammered into shape 235,000 miles of railroad running everywhere, over which 47,000 locomotives are hauling 2,000,000 cars, loaded with the products of the industry of 87,000,000 people, the value of whose products is increased or diminished accordingly as men are employed or unemployed or partly employed. [Applause.]

This factory system, whose fires were lighted in the world a little more than a hundred years ago, and this transportation system, whose wheels were set in motion some fourscore years ago, have reorganized society, reshaped civilization, and now control political policies.

CORPORATE EVOLUTION IN AMERICA.

Here in America down to the close of our civil war we were largely an agricultural nation, but since that time nearly every kind of property, except land, has passed under the control of corporations.

These corporations, organized under the laws of various States, have grown with the nation's growth and the increase of commerce, until they have outgrown the States of their organization, and have become national and international in their scope, and the question whether they shall control the Government or the Government shall control them and itself has lately become acute. [Applause.]

This condition has come about not so much by design, as by the swift evolution of forces which have swept men on either with or without their volition until the time has come when the "rights of persons" and the "rights of things" must be restated, and the rights of the States and the rights of the nation in relation to commerce must be defined.

A man has a right to choose his business and to have it protected under the law, so long as he follows it lawfully, whether it be an incorporated business or otherwise, and "a calling, when chosen, is a man's property and right."

The difficulty is, not that men have availed themselves of statutory invitations to organize themselves into corporations, but that some corporations have become monopolies whose operations are inconsistent with the liberty of the rest of us.

It was never intended that the rights of some should be the wrongs of others.

"The object and end of all government is to promote the happiness and prosperity of the community by which it is established," not of some, but of all.

Therefore when the people, through their legislatures by statutes framed for that purpose, confer upon those of their number desiring to avail themselves thereof the right to be incorporated, they do so not for the purpose of making them the beneficiaries of special privileges and endowing them with power to dictate terms to the people who made them, but that the people themselves may be benefited in lower prices, larger output, and cheaper means of transportation. [Applause.]

Corporations are as necessary to modern business enterprises as are steam and electricity, and the law sanctions and upholds their formation, but it was never intended that corporations should combine among themselves to fix the price of commodities and the price of the transportation of commodities for the rest of mankind, and the controversy now going on between "equal rights" and "special privileges" is broader and deeper than any mere controversy between the President and any coterie of financiers.

It would not stop if the President should stop. It is older than this Administration—older than the nation itself.

It is founded upon the primeval human instinct of fair play, to obtain which in a governmental way this nation was founded and "consecrated to liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." [Applause.]

PUBLIC EMPLOYMENTS.

In the discussion of the question of governmental regulation of corporations some gentlemen talk as if some great new legal principle had been revealed to them personally by special dispensation as the specially ordained "friends of the people," and they have actually run for office on that theory; but most of the legal principles involved have come down to us as part of our jurisprudence established by the judicial interpretation of men who were expounding the law and not running for office.

Around these fundamental principles the changing facts of changing time adjust themselves.

At the outset of any investigation of the legal principles involved in the regulation of natural and artificial persons in their occupations, a fundamental distinction must be observed between public and private occupations.

When private property becomes "affected with a public interest," it ceases to be private property; and private property becomes "affected with a public interest," "when it is used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large."

When a man "devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use and must submit to and be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created." (Munn v. People of Illinois, 94 U. S., 113.)

Now, sir, this has been the law "so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." Is there any reason why when the President invokes this principle and supplements it with another principle which is older than the Ten Commandments, viz, that it is not right to do wrong, he should be charged with being "the man on the barrel head haranguing the mob?"

Sir, if he is the man on the barrel head he is the most valuable man on the barrel head this country has had in its history and he has glorified the barrel head. [Applause.]

To borrow an illustration, first used by Lord Hale some two hundred and fifty years ago, and quoted in the Munn case, a man may have a ferry for his private use and run it as he pleases, but when he opens it to public use and charges public toll it becomes a thing of public interest, subject to public regulation, and he must keep his boat in order, run it regularly, and charge a reasonable toll.

And when the ferryman dedicates his lands at either end of his ferry to public use, as a public way they must be used "upon such terms as and conditions as the body politic may from time to time impose; and this because the common good requires that all public ways shall be under the control of the public authorities."

This principle has been extended along all the thousands of miles of public transportation which have been created since that time.

By this principle, from very early times, toll roads, toll bridges, wharfingers, innkeepers, and common carriers have been controlled, and in modern times it has been extended over railroads, telegraphs, telephones, pipe lines, gas, water, electric, and other public works; and the rule now is that "once the occupation is classed a public calling or is engaged in serving the public by reason of some power or franchise granted to it by the State, the legislature has the right to fix the price that may be charged." (Hendrick on "The power to regulate corporations and commerce," 325, citing People v. Budd, 117 N. Y., 1; affirmed 143 U. S., 517.)

The origin of this legislative power was said by Mr. Justice Taney, in 1847 in the license cases (5 Howard, 583) to be "inherent in every sovereignty—the power to govern men and things," and though subject to the limitation that it should not be used despotically and unreasonably, "at the whim or caprice of the legislative body," "within its legitimate domain, the power is original, absolute, and indefeasible."

From this fundamental sovereign power is derived the power of the Federal Government, expressed in the Constitution, to regulate commerce "among the several States," and the power of the several States to regulate commerce beginning and ending within themselves.

Sir, the commerce clauses of the Federal Constitution were adopted in the presence of a commercial conflict among the thirteen States which threatened the dissolution of their confederation, in which each separate State was levying duties to suit itself, while the Federal Treasury was bankrupt, and foreign nations, when asked for loans, were inquiring whether we were thirteen governments or one.

Then there was not a railroad, steamboat, telegraph, telephone, gas light, electric light, corporate combination, or labor union in the world.

Our center of population was 23 miles east of Baltimore. Ohio was the far west; the Mississippi River was a "mental horizon;" two stages and twelve horses were sufficient to carry all goods and passengers between New York and Boston, and it took six days to make the journey.

PRIVATE EMPLOYMENTS.

But while the body politic has power at common law to regulate occupations "affected with a public interest," the power to regulate occupations not "affected with a public interest" rests upon an entirely different principle, and is confined to the limitation of "contracts in restraint of trade," the prohibition of "contracts in restriction of competition," and to the exercise of the police power.

At common law contracts in partial restraint of trade, limited as to time and territory and founded upon a reasonable consideration, were valid—that is, contracts of sale whereby the vendor of a business bound himself for a valuable consideration not to go into business again within a certain time, within a certain area, were valid—but "no man could contract not to use his trade at all," and the rule, as stated by Mr. Justice Story, was that "an agreement in general or total restraint of trade is void, although it may be founded upon a legal and valuable consideration."

The reasons for the rule were that the public ought not to be deprived of the advantages of commerce and the services of men in useful occupations or to be subjected to the evils of monopoly by such contracts.

In practice, however, this rule did not accomplish its purposes—that is, it did not prevent monopoly and it did not prevent the public from being deprived of the advantages of commerce and the services of men engaged in useful occupations, because contracts which were technically in conformity with the law were constantly made in evasion of its spirit.

Neither was the rule sufficient to prevent monopolies and to prevent the public from being deprived of the services of men in useful occupations, even when strictly observed. For illustration, suppose there are ten trade competitors in a given territory and one trade competitor, for a valuable consideration, enters into a contract with another trade competitor to go out of business, absolutely without limit as to time and territory, such a contract would be void as in restraint of trade, although nine competitors would remain.

But if nine trade competitors should separately, in good faith and without collusion, agree with the tenth to go out of business with formal limitations as to the time and place, these nine contracts of sale would be lawful, although trade would be restricted nine times as much as in the first instance.

Therefore the courts began to hold contracts "in restriction of competition" void, even though they might not be void as "in restraint of trade."

This doctrine against "restriction of competition" is recent, the earlier tendency being to condemn unrestricted competition. For illustration, in Kellogg v. Larkin (3 Pinney, 123, 56 Am. Dec., 164), decided in 1851, a contract to stifle competition in the wheat market was held good, the court saying:

> I admit that it does not tend to stifle the competition of these obligors, and I assert that the right to stifle competition by contract, so far as it is injurious to the parties contracting, has not before been denied or questioned for two hundred years, unless two cases (4 Denio, 349, and 5 Denio, 434) are to be considered as denying the right.

However, "American jurisprudence has firmly settled the doctrine that all contracts which have a palpable tendency to stifle competition, either in the market value of commodities or the carriage or transportation of such commodities, are contrary to public policy, and therefore incapable of conferring upon the parties thereto any rights which a court of justice can recognize or enforce."

(Texas, etc., Ry. Co. v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co., 41 La. Ann., 970; 17 Am. State Reps., 445.)

How far American jurisprudence has reasoned itself away from the old doctrine, allowing the right of competitors to stifle competition among themselves by contract, is shown in the case of Richards v. Buhl (77 Mich., 622), which involved the validity of a combination known as the Diamond Match Company, in which the court said:

> Monopoly in trade or in any kind of business in this country is odious to our form of government. * * * Its tendency is destructive of free institutions and repugnant to the instincts of a free people, and contrary to the whole scope and spirit of the Federal Constitution, and is not allowed to exist under express provision in several of our State constitutions. Indeed, it is doubtful if free government can long exist in a country where such enormous amounts of money are allowed to be accumulated in the vaults of corporations, to be used at discretion in controlling the property and business of the country against the interest of the public and that of the people for the personal gain and aggrandizement of a few individuals. It is always destructive of individual rights and of that free competition which is the life of business, and it revives and perpetuates one of the great evils which it was the object of the framers of our form of government to eradicate and prevent.
> It is alike destructive to both individual enterprise and individual prosperity, whether conferred upon corporations or individuals, and therefore public policy is or ought to be, as well as public sentiment, against it. All combinations among persons or corporations for the purpose of raising or controlling the prices of merchandise or any of the necessaries of life are monopolies and intolerable and ought to receive the condemnation of all courts.

DEFENSES.

In answer to the charge of unlawful combination it is no defense to say that the public has not been injured. "It may be true that it," the Standard Oil Company, "has improved the quality and cheapened the cost of petroleum and its products to the consumer. But such is not one of the usual or general results of a monopoly; and it is the policy of the law to regard not what may, but what usually happens. Experience shows that it is not wise to trust human cupidity where it has the opportunity to aggrandize itself at the expense of others. The claim of having cheapened the price to the consumer is the usual pretext on which monopolies of this kind are defended." (State v. Standard Oil Co., 49 Ohio State, 137.)

Nor that a monopoly has resulted in lower prices. "That policy may have been necessary to crush competition," and it rests in the discretion of the "company to raise the price to an exorbitant degree." (Richards v. Buhl, 77 Mich., 632.)

Nor that a complete monopoly has not been established. "It is sufficient if it" (the combination) "really tends to that end, and to deprive the public of the advantages which flow from free competition." (U. S. v. Knight, 156 U. S., 1; Addystone Pipe, etc., Co. v. U. S., 175 U. S., 211.)

Nor is it now apparently necessary that the commodity handled shall be "a necessity of life," although this has been a matter of some conflict. But while "the weight of authority and the growing tendency of the courts is to disregard the question as to whether the article is a necessity of life or not" (74 Am. State Reports, 270), even if it should be held that a combination "in restriction of competition" must deal in "a necessity of life" in order to bring it within the legal definition of an unlawful combination, the courts have covered enough commodities into the catalogue of necessities to make it difficult for any combination to escape the force of precedent in this respect.

Among these commodities are coal, gas, matches, lumber, cotton bagging, butter, grain, salt, alcohol, beer, candles, milk, preserves, cloth, grain bags, harrows, brick; gas, sewer, and other pipe; rules, powder, pressed metal parts, gelatin capsules, wooden ware, sugar, oil, meat, news, wire cloth, envelopes, fire-alarm telegraph instruments, bluestone, cigarettes, insurance, carriage, and labor.

COMMON-LAW RESTRICTIONS OF COMBINATIONS.

Not only are contracts in restriction of competition void at common law, but the common law is vigilant to prevent combinations.

For illustration, at common law (1) a corporation can not enter into a partnership (Hendrick, citing 10 Gray, 582); (2) corporations can not enter into partnership with other corporations through delegation of powers to committees of the respective corporations (Hendrick, citing 86 Tenn., 598); (3) corporations can not enter into agreements to pay into a pool a certain sum of each item of business (Hendrick, citing 47 Ohio State, 320); (4) corporations can not become members of an unincorporated association for the restraint of trade (Hendrick, citing 161 Pa. State, 473); (5) corporations can not transfer their stock to a holding board in exchange for certificates in proportion to the amount of their stock (Hendrick, citing People v. North River Sugar Refining Company, 121 N. Y., 582, and State v. Standard Oil Co., 49 Ohio State, 137); (6) a corporation can not in the absence of express statutory authority become an incorporator by subscribing for shares in a new corporation, either directly or by their agents (Central Railroad Co. v. Pa. R. R. Co., 31 N. J. Eq., 475); (7) corporations can not own shares in other corporations for the purpose of controlling them or for speculative purposes (Morawetz Priv. Corp., sec. 432); (8) at common law stockholders could not vote by proxy (Hendrick, citing 14 N. J. Law, 222); (9) an agreement by stockholders to surrender their voting power to trustees is illegal (Hendrick, citing 6 Pa. Court Reps., 193); and (10) the conveyance of the stock of several corporations to a holding corporation, the constituent companies remaining in existence, is illegal and will be set aside (Hendrick, citing Northern Securities Co. v. U. S., 193 U. S., 197). See Hendricks on The Power to Regulate Corporations and Commerce, 292–296.

THE ORGANIZATION OF TRUSTS.

Notwithstanding this, however, and notwithstanding Federal and State statutes against contracts and combinations in restraint of trade, within recent times there has been an irresistible movement toward great combinations, representing enormous capitalization, which has led some political economists to assert that competition is dead and the means of its resurrection unknown to science.

Down to May 31, 1900, Census Bulletin No. 122, which considered only combinations consisting of "a number of formerly independent mills which had been brought together into one company under a charter obtained for that purpose," enumerated 183 corporations with 2,029 active and 174 idle plants, having an actual invested capital of a billion and a half dollars, and an authorized capitalization of over three and a half billion dollars, then employing an average of 433,777 people and paying out in wages and salaries $227,188,343 a year.

Of these corporations, only 63 had been organized before 1897, and more than half of them had been organized within the eighteen months before June 30, 1900.

Within the first six months of 1901 combinations capitalized at more than two billion dollars were organized, and the movement swept on until it reached a climax about three years ago, carrying with it nearly every kind of industrial, commercial, and transportation business.

In the final report of the Census of Manufactures for 1905 it is said:

> One of the most effective methods of forming a large manufacturing enterprise is to consolidate existing independent establishments. Such a method eliminates all of the uncertainties attending the inauguration of new establishments. The business relations are formed, the sale of products, and consequently the profits, are in a measure assured, and the uncertainty attending the investment reduced to a minimum. Either independent plants may be purchased or erected to meet the increase of business or a new company may be formed for the sole purpose of bringing together under one management formerly independent mills.

The word "trust" was originally used to define an arrangement among stockholders of various corporations whereby shares of stock were deposited in the hands of trustees, who issued trust certificates in lieu of stock certificates and apportioned dividends and losses thereon.

But trusts so organized were driven from their trust formation by statutes and court decisions and forced to take refuge under the laws of various States like New Jersey, Delaware, and West Virginia, which passed laws especially framed to facilitate their formation, and the word "trust" is now "used to designate any combination of producers for the purpose of controlling prices and suppressing competition." (2 Cook on Corporations, sec. 503a.)

Corporations organized under the laws of one State may have their offices and factories where they please and trade all over the country, subject to the regulation of the various States, which are in turn restrained by the fourteenth amendment.

Their formation, regulation, and control, so far as the States are concerned, is miscellaneous and depends upon the various views of various legislatures, and to some extent upon the tendency of some gentlemen temporarily intrusted with legislative power to exploit themselves for political purposes.

The old idea of a market was a place where producers and consumers met and discovered their mutual needs, but the modern corporate combination, each in its separate field, itself becomes the market of supply and demand. It buys or produces its raw material in shiploads, train loads, and whole crops, and converts it into finished product with the regularity and precision of a law of nature.

It conducts its business with minute and scientific precision and economy, and seeks to make each unit of production the perfect illustration of the highest skill and best machinery.

Its smaller neighbor copies its price list and lives by sufferance, subject to the power of the trust to absorb it or remove it by reducing prices and restoring them after the funeral.

As illustrating the gigantic strength of these aggregations, it is said that the United States Steel Corporation manufactures more than half of the steel output of the country, employs an average of 158,000 people, and pays out in wages more than $100,000,000 a year.

GENTLEMEN WHO CAN NOT BE EXPECTED TO BE HOSTILE TO THEIR MUTUAL INTERESTS.

Sir, it is said that there are ten men living in the United States who could, if they chose to cooperate, control all the railroads, telegraphs, and telephones in the country, the steamship traffic on the Great Lakes, and at the same time direct the policy of the coal, copper, steel, sugar, and oil industries.

In transportation it is said that six great systems control the railroad mileage of the country, and that these six systems are practically controlled by about six men.

These statements are probably exaggerated, but a discount of 50 per cent leaves them strong enough.

Business in this way becomes reduced to a few large units, run by a few large units, who can easily get together and confer.

There is a law in the physical world that bodies attract one another in proportion to their mass.

In the commercial world, coal, oil, copper, sugar, steel, and railroads have affinity for one another, and all of them have more or less morganatic relations with other industries. [Laughter and applause.]

The same names appear in the directorates of many corporations, and if a man happens to be a director of several different corporations, it is asking too much of human nature to expect him to be hostile to himself in his several capacities.

In this way little groups of gentleman who can not be expected to be hostile to themselves in their several capacities, sitting around green tables, easily tend to become commercial oligarchies, who benevolently control the prices of commodities and the price of carrying commodities of a large number of mere people. [Laughter and applause.]

Through the paper shares of corporate assets, which become a species of money based on assets and on faith, and through the distribution of their funds in banks and otherwise, these gentlemen who can not be expected to be hostile to themselves in their several capacities further extend their influence through the commercial world and turn the wheel of fortune forward or backward for millions of people.

These shares of stock become not only the property of prudent investors seeking a source of steady income, but they become counters in the financial game of chance, where windblown fortunes are made and demolished in a single day, as lately happened when shares of stock, floating in the rosy atmosphere of public confidence above a solid groundwork of phenomenal prosperity, were carried down with the sudden ebb of public confidence.

RECENT DEVELOPMENT OF MANUFACTURING AND TRANSPORTATION.

Sir, this problem of corporate combinations has come upon us quickly. It is not our problem alone; it is the problem of modern, civilized society. It is not local, but international.

Trusts exist alike in empires and republics under free trade and protective policies, and the more advanced nations are commercially the more their industries have combined.

Not only have the industries of Europe organized themselves into corporate combinations, but corporate combinations have organized themselves into international trade combinations for the purpose of apportioning output and controlling prices.

Within a generation the system of huge investments supported by small profits on many sales has spread throughout the industrial world.

Manufacturers have become trusts, and mercantile establishments have become department stores.

The relations between labor and capital have become less and less personal, although industrial leadership has been constantly recruited from the ranks of labor, and the words "master" and "servant," although still preserved as legal terms, have become misnomers of a relation more accurately described by the words "corporate combination" and "labor union."

Here in America more than half of our 235,000 miles of railroad have been laid within the last twenty-five years.

For some time railroads were local. Several bills of lading were frequently required for a shipment of freight within the limits of a single State, and in 1866, to encourage interstate extensions, Congress passed a law among other things providing:

That every railroad in the United States whose road is operated by steam be, and is hereby, authorized * * * to connect with roads of other States so as to form continuous lines.

Freight cars of 10 tons capacity were then coming east full and going back empty over 50-pound iron rails, wooden bridges, sharp curves, and steep grades.

Now freight cars of 50 tons capacity are going both ways full over 100-pound steel rails, steel bridges, straightened curves, and lowered grades, and connect with ships capable of carrying train loads.

REGULATION.

For a long time the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States and the power of the States to regulate commerce beginning and ending within themselves was little used, because commerce needed encouragement rather than regulation.

Besides, the people were busy with their own affairs; and the country is big, and it took some time for business interests to get big enough to crowd one another and the lesser man between.

When the people finally became nationally conscious, they found that we had passed from individualism to centralization; that railroads had, by the very momentum of their own development, acquired the power of life and death over industrial enterprises by their power to discriminate for or against persons and places; that corporate combinations had taken possession of the industrial field; that colossal carrying corporations and colossal industrial corporations were combining among themselves to control prices; that forty-five sovereign States—now forty-six—were creating industrial corporations doing interstate business without much inclination or ability to control them; and they began slowly, unsystematically, and sporadically to try to make head against a condition of which they themselves were a part.

The Federal Government began to repair its armory of disused statutes, to make new ones to reenforce and extend the common law, and to move in the direction of a settled policy.

EPITOME OF HEPBURN LAW.

In 1887 Congress passed "An act to regulate commerce," known as the "interstate-commerce act," which it amended from time to time, and finally overhauled completely in 1906. The following is an epitome of its provisions:

Section 1:

a. Defines commerce to which act is applicable, and includes pipe lines, sleeping-car companies, and express companies as common carriers.

b. Defines railroads and includes within the term, bridges, ferries, tracks, depots, yards, grounds, spurs, switches, and terminal facilities.

c. Defines transportation and includes within the term "all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage," including delivery, elevation, transfer, ventilation, refrigeration, storage, and handling.

d. Requires carriers to furnish transportation on reasonable request and establish through routes and joint rates.

e. Requires just and reasonable and prohibits unjust and unreasonable rates.

f. Prohibits giving of free passes, except in certain specified cases, and fixes penalty for violation.

g. Prohibits, after May 1, 1908, transportation by carrier of any article, except of timber, produced by it, except such as may be necessary in the conduct of its business as a common carrier.

h. Requires carriers to furnish cars and make reasonable switch connections with branch and private tracks, and gives Commission power to compel compliance.

Section 2:

a. Requires carriers to publish and to file with Commission schedules of their rates and of joint rates.

b. Prohibits change of published rates, except on thirty days' notice, unless permitted by Commission.

c. Requires each party to joint tariff, other than carrier filing same, to file evidence of concurrence therein.

d. Requires carriers to file all joint traffic agreements.

e. Authorizes Commission to prescribe form of published schedules.

f. Prohibits carrier from engaging in interstate commerce until schedule of rates filed and published.

g. Prohibits departure from schedule of rates filed and published.

h. Prohibits rebates and special privileges and prescribes penalties.

i. Gives preference to military traffic in time of war.

j. Makes offense committed by officer or agent of corporation carrier an offense by corporation and prescribes penalties.

k. Prescribes penalty for failure to publish and observe rates.

l. Makes it misdemeanor to "offer, grant, or give or to solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination" outside of filed and published rates, prescribes penalty and fixes venue.

m. Makes violation by agent misdemeanor and also makes such violation misdemeanor of carrier.

n. Provides that in prosecutions of carrier filed and published rate shall be "conclusively deemed to be legal rate" as against such carrier.

o. Prohibits shippers from accepting money or other valuable consideration as a rebate or offset, and prescribes forfeiture of three times the value of consideration received, in addition to penalty hereinbefore provided.

Section 3:

a. Requires Commission to make and enter of record reports of investigations, decisions, awards, and of findings of fact in case damages awarded, and to furnish copies thereof to parties.

b. Makes authorized publications of reports and decisions of Commission competent evidence in United States and State courts.

Section 4:

a. Provides that when Commission, upon complaint, after hearing, is of opinion that rates, regulations, or practices of carrier are "unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, unduly preferential, or prejudicial," it shall determine and prescribe "just, fair, and reasonable" rates, as maximum rates to be charged, prescribe regulations and practices, and make order directing carrier to cease violation, and such carrier shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate in excess of such maximum rate.

b. Provides that orders of Commission shall be effective within not less than thirty days of issue and shall continue in force for not more than two years, unless suspended or modified by Commission, or set aside by court of competent jurisdiction.

c. Commission may fix proportion of joint rates to be borne by joint carriers, where carriers can not agree.

d. Commission may, on complaint and after hearing, fix through routes and maximum joint rates, by land or water, where carriers refuse to fix such routes and rates.

e. Commission may fix maximum reasonable allowance for service or instrumentality furnished by shipper in transportation.

Section 5:

a. Provides that Commission shall fix damages to complainant for violation of act and issue order directing payment by carrier.

b. Provides legal procedure for recovery of damages if payment refused.

c. Provides that where single order of Commission awarding damages is in favor of several parties complainant as against several carriers, parties complainant may be joined as plaintiffs and carriers joined as defendants, fixes venue, provides for service of process and for judgment.

d. Provides for service by registered mail of orders of Commission, makes registry receipt prima facie evidence of service, provides for modifications of orders, and requires compliance therewith.

e. Imposes forfeiture of $5,000 for violation of order of Commission, making each distinct violation a separate offense, and, in case of continuing violation, each day shall be a separate offense.

f. Provides procedure for recovery of forfeiture.

g. Provides procedure for enforcement of orders of Commission by writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, upon petition to circuit court, and for appeal by either party.

h. Fixes venue of suits to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend orders of Commission; provides for expediting of suits under act of February 11, 1903, and for appeals.

i. Provides that schedules of rates, contracts, agreements, or arrangements between carriers, filed with Commission, shall be public records, and when certified by secretary of Commission shall be received as prima facie evidence of "what they purport to be" in investigations by Commission or in judicial proceedings.

Section 6:

a. Provides that Commission may require filing of annual, monthly, and special reports by carriers, prescribes what annual reports shall contain, and requires carriers to furnish such specific information as Commission may from time to time require, and provides penalty for failure to comply.

b. Authorizes Commission to prescribe forms of accounts and records to be kept by carriers, gives Commission access thereto, provides for submission thereof to Commission or its agents or examiners, and provides penalty for refusal of carrier.

c. Makes false entry in, and mutilation, destruction, falsification, or alteration of accounts or records a misdemeanor and fixes penalty.

d. Provides penalty for unauthorized divulging of information by examiner.

e. Gives circuit and district courts jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus to compel compliance with provisions of act.

f. Provides that where property shipped over several lines carrier receiving property shall be liable to shipper for loss or damage by other carriers and may in turn recover from such other carriers.

Section 8:

a. Provides for membership, salary, and organization of Commission.

Section 9:

a. Extends provisions relating to attendance of witnesses, producing of evidence, and compelling of testimony under original and amended interstate-commerce act to this act.

Section 10:

a. Repeals conflicting laws, but exempts pending causes from operation of amendments made by this act.

Section 11:

a. Provides that act shall be in force from and after passage.

I submit this epitome in refutation, so far as Federal legislation is concerned, of the claim of certain railroads that recent "drastic and inimical Federal and State legislation" will compel them to reduce the wages of their employees, and I assert that there is nothing in this law that furnishes the slightest pretext for such action.

THE SHERMAN ANTITRUST LAW AND THE BUREAU OF CORPORATIONS.

In 1890 Congress also passed the "Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," known as the Sherman antitrust law, which makes "every contract combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of commerce among the several States or with foreign nations," illegal and punishable by fine and imprisonment.

In the construction of this statute the courts have been obliged to hold that it aims at all restraints of trade, whether reasonable or otherwise and whether they tend to form monopolies or not.

(U. S. v. Trans.-Mo. Ft. Assn., 166 U. S., 290; U. S. v. Coal Dealers' Assn., 85 Fed. Rep., 252; U. S. v. Hopkins, 82 Fed. Rep. 529.)

In commenting upon this law in his last annual message the President refers to his repeated statements that "experience has definitely shown not merely the unwisdom but the futility of endeavoring to put a stop to all business combinations," and says:

> Modern industrial conditions are such that combination is not only necessary but inevitable. It is so in the world of business just as it is in the world of labor, and it is as idle to desire to put an end to all corporations, to all big combinations of capital, as to desire to put an end to all combinations of labor.
> Corporation and labor union alike have come to stay. Each, if properly managed, is a source of good and not evil.
> Whenever in either there is evil it should be promptly held to account; but it should receive hearty encouragement so long as it is properly managed.
> It is profoundly immoral to put or keep on the statute books a law nominally in the interest of public morality that really puts a premium upon public immorality by undertaking to forbid honest men from doing what must be done under modern business conditions, so that the law itself provides that its own infraction must be a condition precedent upon business success.

In 1903 a Bureau of Corporations in the Department of Commerce and Labor was created to compel publicity, and, indirectly, to prevent stock watering, and directed to investigate the operation of corporations other than railroads.

These laws were framed and passed by Republican Congresses, and under the Administrations of William McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt this Government has gone steadily on with the business of resuming control over itself by making corporate combinations subservient to law and order.

NATIONAL AND STATE RIGHTS IN THE REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

Incited by Federal activity, the States have been aroused from an attitude of indifference into crusades of active emulation, as a result of which a good deal of ill-digested legislation has been proposed, some of which has become law, and as a further result an important legal question has arisen as to the adjustment of the rights of the States and the rights of the nation in the regulation of commerce.

Few railroads are now local. The same train carries both through and local freight; a State line has no logical relation to running expenses, and in the regulation of rates a State is not permitted to consider a road as a whole as to whether it is prosperous or otherwise, but it must fix rates according to the business done within its boundaries, although it is said to be impossible for a State or a railroad to apportion running expenses between through and local freight.

However, it has been judicially determined that States have the right to fix intrastate rates, and the courts have now the task of harmonizing the power of the several States to regulate commerce, beginning and ending within their several boundaries, and therefore severally and disjointedly to regulate commerce among themselves, with the power of Congress to regulate commerce "among the several States."

And the courts have also the further task of reconciling the power of the several States to initiate rival and retaliatory legislation with the fact that this is one of the things that the commerce clause in the Constitution was framed to prevent.

The conflict between State and interstate regulations is illustrated by a case which arose in Kentucky and was determinated by the Federal Supreme Court in 1901. Section 218 of the constitution of Kentucky prohibited any common carrier in that State from charging or receiving more in the aggregate for a shorter haul than for a longer haul, where the shorter distance was included in the longer distance; and, in the case of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company v. Eubank (184 U. S., 27), in which it appears that the company charged the plaintiff 25 cents per hundred pounds for transporting tobacco from Franklin, Ky., to Louisville, Ky., while at the same time it was transporting tobacco from Nashville, Tenn., to Louisville, Ky., over the same road at 12 cents per hundred pounds, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the provision was such "a hindrance to, interference with, and regulation of commerce" as to render it unconstitutional.

The effect of State rates upon interstate rates, under this decision, is discussed in a very able paper read by Hon. Charles F. Amidon, United States district judge for North Dakota, before the American Bar Association last September, in which he refers to recent legislation of the State of Minnesota in these words:

> As the result of the schedule of rates prescribed by the State of Minnesota during the past winter, the rates on the western side of an invisible line were from 25 to 50 per cent higher than those on the eastern side. The railways could not maintain both these rates without discriminating against North Dakota points in a manner which would constitute a gross violation of that portion of the interstate-commerce act which forbids discrimination against any locality. The necessary result of the enforcement of the local rates was to compel a reduction of all through rates. This the Supreme Court has decided is such a direct interference with interstate commerce as to render the action of the State void.

In the power of the courts to determine whether the rates fixed by a Federal or State commission are reasonable or unreasonable resides the ultimate authority under our scheme of Government to equalize rates as between a national commission and State commissions, because neither the legislative body nor the commission acting under the authority of the legislative body has power to establish a tariff of rates so low as to deprive a carrier of its profits without just compensation, on the one hand, nor so high as to deprive the public of transportation at reasonable rates upon the other hand; and in the exercise of this high and important duty nothing is more important than that the courts should hold the scales of justice between the States and the nation, between shippers and carriers, with absolute impartiality, free from all influence except the influence of legal principles, so that no taint of sensationalism or of favoritism shall ever attach to them.

If conditions in 1787 indicated the necessity of giving power to the Federal Government to regulate interstate commerce, conditions now require the exercise of that power, not only to protect consumers, independent producers, and shippers from the combined power of cooperating combinations, but to protect the railroads themselves from the demands of powerful shippers; and no other question to-day equals in importance the question of how the relation between the United States and the States, and the corporations within the United States and the States, shall be adjusted.

REDUCING PRINCIPLES TO PRACTICE.

Sir, in this work of making corporate combinations subservient to law and order, Theodore Roosevelt has been and is the strongest single element of civic virtue in the United States.

He has been and is the fearless herald of reform, the courageous advocate of the rights, welfare, and dignity of the people of the United States of America. [Applause.]

He has not only met every emergency, but he has towered above every emergency, and he has the backing and support of every man who believes that the best way to get pure water is not to paint the pump, but to clean out the well. [Applause.]

He has helped to keep the standard of Republicanism what it is and what it ought to be—the standard of the highest citizenship—to the intense dissatisfaction of some of our citizens, the measure of whose patriotism has had to be taken by the Bertillon system. [Laughter and applause.]

Not only has he helped to maintain the standard of Republican principles, but gentlemen on the other side are now claiming that he has adopted their principles with great enthusiasm and success, so that they have not got a principle left to stand on, which, however, it is not anticipated will make the slightest difference in the character of their next campaign. [Laughter.]

Under his leadership the Republican party has gone steadily on with the business of reducing principles to practical results.

This has been done not in any spirit of hostility to corporations as such, but "with malice toward none; with charity to all."

In the language of the President, in his first message to this Congress, "the aim of the National Government is quite as much to favor and protect honest corporations, honest business men of wealth, as to bring to justice those individuals and corporations representing dishonest methods."

It is said that the President's reiterated statements of his policy of the prosecution of dishonest methods brought on a panic already prepared by a declining public confidence, manifested by the withdrawal of stock investments and a depression of securities.

But what hurt public confidence more—the lawlessness of certain financiers who began to believe themselves above the law or their correction.

What hurt public confidence more—the insurance scandals or their investigation?

What hurt public confidence more—the custom of rebates and unjust discriminations or the enforcement of the law against them?

Sir, "it is a light thing for the shadow to go down 10 degrees. Nay, but let the shadow return backward 10 degrees;" and if the shadow on the dial which measures the hours by which we rule our lives had marked some decadence of commercial ideals, Theodore Roosevelt has been the strongest single element in America during his Administration for the restoration of those ideals. [Applause.]

There may not be quite so much of a rush among sycophants and timeservers to take a walk with him on a rainy day, now that he has declared that he will not be a candidate for reelection, but history will record him as among those who have faithfully administered heavy responsibility with no other fear than the fear of God. [Applause.]

Sir, am I mistaken when I say the people of this country want these principles to be continued and that they want the banner of these principles to be carried forward by a man who is in sympathy with these principles?

THE EXERCISE OF VARYING FACULTIES.

The stipulation in Magna Charta, which has been reproduced in various forms in various constitutions, that "no man shall be deprived of his free customs and privileges," embraces the right of men to exercise their faculties in lawful avocations, jointly or severally, individually or in corporations, to fix prices and to raise and lower them.

Liberty in this country means not only freedom from imprisonment and servitude, but it means the right of men to live and to work in lawful occupations where they will and how they will.

But the regulation of men by law in their commercial relations, which is intended to broaden the opportunity of all by preventing, so far as law can prevent it, the monopoly of opportunity by a few, only deals with the surface manifestations of the profounder problems of the social relations of the people, by whom and for whom this Government was founded and is maintained.

Sir, the movement now going on to promote honesty in commercial and political methods by laws framed to restrain dishonest aggression by some upon the rights of others is not only an ethical movement, but it involves the perpetuity of our Republic.

Our civilization is and must be, if we shall continue to be a republic, something more than "a dead, iron machine, the god of it gravitation and selfish hunger," grinding out class distinctions.

If we are to continue to be a republic, there must not be any such thing as organized class proprietorship of the resources of this country.

If we are to continue to be a republic, there must not be any such thing as class control of the avenues upward in this country.

The fact that has distinguished and does distinguish this nation above all the other nations on earth is that here in America the boy, no matter how poor, "slumbering at the gate of dreams," may dream of a future and realize it some time—here under the Stars and Stripes, and every immigrant who crosses the gang plank at Ellis Island knows when he sees that flag that it means widened opportunity—the breath of a new life.

This democracy of opportunity is the birthright of every American citizen, which no dishonest methods ought to be permitted to curtail. [Applause.]

But, sir, the very right of men to dream of a future and to live and to work and to exercise their faculties in lawful avocations presupposes the exercise of varying faculties in varying occupations with varying ambitions and varying results in wealth and power and social distinction, and by the exercise of these varying faculties, spurred on by ambition, the world has been subdued and civilized.

Some people have an idea that they are poor because others are well off, but in the school of experience each man has to pass an examination every day, and he is marked up or marked down inexorably.

UNEQUAL DIVISION.

This struggle for what men call success begins early and ends late—ends only in the cemetery, and even there the monument of success towers in marble pride above the humbler graves.

It has been going on ever since pasture grew scarce for the joint flocks of Abraham and Lot.

It is the animal tooth-and-claw struggle for mere existence translated into the struggle for wealth and power and social distinction, and its aggregate results inventory large in our national census.

Some one has figured that our national wealth amounts to more than $130,000,000,000, and Mulhall estimated a few years ago that every day the sun rises it sees two and a half million dollars added to the wealth of this Republic, and this wealth is divided in varying shifting shares among a population ranging all the way from mendicant to millionaire.

To the tramp on the track looking for a dry culvert to sleep in this is all a remote abstraction, having no relation to the next meal.

To the capitalist it means the conquest of the forces of nature by science and machinery, developed by capital.

To the Socialist it means the piled-up accumulation of labor, which ought to be "expropriated" by the state and divided among the members of society "according to their reasonable needs" upon a universal obligation of labor.

To the Republican it means prosperity, aided by Republican policies.

To the Democrat it means he says prosperity in spite of Republican policies, which he secretly fears would be dissipated if he were permitted to gain control. [Laughter]

To the demagogue it means a chance to tell the people that the whole thing means terrapin, champagne, coupons, yachts, automobiles, and private cars of which they are unlawfully deprived by political and financial jugglery, and how much better it would all be if he were given a political job. [Laughter.]

And this wealth is not divided equally among us, but if it were divided equally among us, it would immediately begin to distribute itself again into debts and dividends, overdrafts and balances, and some would gamble theirs away before morning.

The money-getting faculty ranges all the way from the mere money-getting instinct, with its prehensile grasp, to the capacity for great affairs, and it works in devious ways and forms.

One man gets control of some patent medicine, advertises it and induces foolish people to tell their symptoms to the public; another gets control of some machine that the genius of a Watt or a Galvani has potentially set in motion; another buys pelts of the Indians as Astor did; another sets a mouse trap in Wall street as Gould did, and the next generation immediately begins to look for a coat of arms, intermarries with so-called "foreign nobility," advertises its wardrobe, and gains international notoriety in the divorce courts. [Laughter.]

This money that men are struggling for is a symbol and equivalent, convertible into almost anything, from the price of a meal to the price of an empire, except happiness.

It brings power to gross, paunchy, unillumined hoggishness, crowding at the financial trough, and it is the medium of exchange whereby the noblest traits of human nature are translated into deeds, and in its pursuit men have strained every energy and broken every Commandment.

But a world with no rival enterprises and ambitions struggling upward; a world of eternal contentment in statu quo, would be a lotus eater's dream of changeless rest and nothingness.

It is not possible that all should be equally rich or that all should be equally poor, any more than it is possible that all should be equally intelligent and all equally honest. But if you were going to make all the world equal, whom would you make all the world equal to? What would be your standard?

RENDERING RETURN TO SOCIETY.

Sir, notwithstanding the fate of Dives and the possible effect of a bank account as "contributory negligence," there are worse things than being rich, and one of these things is being a liar and a hypocrite, and pretending you would not like to do it yourself. [Laughter and applause.]

The Scriptures enjoin diligence in business, and the man who returned 100 per cent on the talent left with him for investment was made "ruler over many things," and he still continues to rule over many things.

The wealth of some of these rulers over many things is a splendid benefaction to all who come in contact with them, and the wealth of others is of no benefit either to themselves or to anyone else.

A world without business is an impossible world, and in a world of business men have a right to their reward.

The average business man gives something back to society for what he takes and the higher his talent the more he gives, and this element of reciprocity—barring gamblers, swindlers, social parasites, and fungous growths—runs through human activities all the way from mediocrity to genius—from the man who manufactures toothpicks to the man who discovers a new world.

An occasional Thoreau is an interesting exception in the midst of enterprise, but a community of Thoreaus would contribute nothing to progress or to taxes.

The doctor or the surgeon who saves a life, the scientist who discovers an anæsthetic which saves humanity an inferno of pain, the statesman or the diplomat who averts a costly war, the inventor who makes the luxuries of yesterday the things of common use to-day, the captain of industry who organizes an enterprise which gives employment to thousands—these men render service to society and for what they take they render valuable return.

Take, for illustration, the building of railroads. The railroad builders and managers of this country have, as a whole, by their faith, skill, courage, and energy, contributed to the public welfare.

Judged by the rule that makes a man a public benefactor who makes two blades of grass to grow where one or none grew before, they have probably grown about as many tons to the acre as the average politician. [Laughter.]

It is true they have had gigantic power beyond the mere hauling of freight and passengers, which they have used with gigantic effect, not only for their own benefit, but for the benefit of the country.

They have built for profit. Who builds otherwise? But they have strained invention to reduce distance, and there never was a time when a man could travel so far or ship so much so far for so little money as now.

They have built for profit, but they, more than any other industrial agency, have bound together a homogeneous America.

They have built for profit, but their work with pick and ax and team and construction train has opened, peopled, and transformed desert wastes into fertile fields and strung statehouses, towns, churches, schools, colleges, and factories along their rights of way.

To say that these men shall not have their fair reward would be as unfair as to say a section man should not have fair pay for an honest day's work.

Sir, I have great respect for the man who does things, but at the same time I do not want him to reduce the rest of mankind to mere material to be worked like the rank and file in Homer's Iliad, whose chief function was to furnish heads for his heroes to break. [Laughter.]

Railroad managers have run their business too much like an independent sovereignty to which the country was tributary and have treated transportation too much like a commodity to be taken at their price or let alone, except when dealing with their corporate peers.

For this the people themselves have been in part to blame, but the situation is evolving its own correction and incidentally it has presented a splendid opportunity for a certain kind of statesmen who, after reading one or two pamphlets on transportation, have felt themselves thoroughly competent to take command of the whole situation, and at the same time they have not neglected to have themselves photographed as in mortal combat with octopuses. [Laughter.]

Sir, when I see the success of some men in politics, I know that the saying that you can not get something for nothing when applied to politics is a lie. [Laughter.]

OLD PROBLEMS IN A NEW SETTING.

That part of our press, sir, which analyzes the events which it chronicles has called attention to two opposite tendencies in our growth, viz, that while we have been growing more democratic in politics, religion, and education, we have been growing more autocratic industrially, but the statement of problem suggests its own solution.

Two inconsistent movements can not long continue side by side; one or the other must in the long run prevail; either democracy will abolish autocracy or increasing autocracy will continue to encroach upon a diminishing democracy to the point of its extinction.

But, sir, it is not likely that democracy will yield, because the great democratic movement which is constantly going on in the world is the most ancient, uniform, and permanent tendency in history, and here in America it has reached its highest manifestation.

But this does not mean that all men will be made equal. We have no evidence that this is likely.

God made men different here, and hereafter, we are told, the difference will be still more marked—that is, we are told that some of us will be subjected to a higher temperature than others. [Laughter.]

Sir, these aggregations of capital, these combinations of labor, these differences between labor and capital, these lines of social cleavage are but the present manifesations of ancient differences which have seethed and fermented under all forms of government since governments were instituted among men.

If we have acquired great natural resources here in America, we have also acquired a condition of liberty in which the natural traits, talents, and differences of humanity flourish and fructify.

After centuries of warfare with caste, privilege, prerogative, kings, and dynasties humanity has realized here its ultimate ideal of popular government, and the people are supreme, but that does not make them all equally supreme.

Liberty is universal, education is common, and everybody is the equal of everybody before the law, except that, as a rule, the poor man has the advantage over the rich man before the jury. [Laughter.]

If, sir, we have inherited the accumulated endowment of centuries of genius and of labor, we have also inherited the unsolved problems of all the past.

If we are more and more conquerors of matter, the fundamental problems of human existence puzzle the minds of men now as they did two thousand years ago.

"THE THING THAT HAS BEEN, IT IS THAT WHICH SHALL BE."

Civilization still presents the paradox of want in the midst of plenty, hunger in the midst of feasting, and the abolition of poverty is still the dream of visionaries.

The meek may eventually inherit the earth, but the laws of descent are not framed that way now. [Laughter.]

We have no titles of nobility, but we have men who command markets to rise and they rise, to fall and they fall, and we have constant illustrations of the involuntary deference that one million pays to two millions, just as it always did. [Laughter.]

There are men of great wealth and great men of wealth, just as there always were, but in practice the public comment makes but little distinction between the two-talent man and the five-talent man, except that the five-talent man is more frequently singled out for denunciation, just as he always was.

There are a good many people who regard wealth as incompatible with honesty anyway unless they themselves are well off, just as there always were. [Laughter.]

If a rich man gives to charity and public benefactions he is likely to be regarded as a contrite pirate contributing to a conscience fund, just as he always was. [Laughter.]

The logic of dishonest premises and prosperous conclusions; of the triumph of craft and brute force; of visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children; of being pushed by the dead hands of heredity still awaits post-mortem explanation, just as it always did.

The mammoth pumpkin, the charlatan, the juggler, the clever swindler, the adept in high finance still attract and hold the crowd and still collect toll from their credulity, just as they always did; and the demagogue who loves the people for what he can get out of them is still talking with unction, just as he always did.

It is a good deal easier to see the mote in our neighbor's eye than it is to see the beam in our own eye, just as it always was.

During the coal strike the Standard Oil Company was denounced for raising the price of oil the fractional part of a cent, and the most vigorous and vociferous denouncer among my acquaintances was a man who owned a wood yard and doubled the price of his wood without making any discrimination in favor of the poor, and there was not the slightest analogy in his mind between his conduct and that of the Standard Oil Company. He had the supply and was letting the law of supply and demand do its work, just as the man with the supply has always done.

We talk about peace, and we establish an international foundry for the beating of swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks, but the world's greatest gun maker died a year or so ago the richest man in Europe and the Nobel prize goes to the man whose peace policy is to be prepared for war [laughter], and we demonstrate our Navy in proof of our preparedness, and a nation is respectable in the international world when it has armies and navies enough to protect itself, just as it always was.

We talk about the "simple life," but the appurtenances of civilization contribute to its complexity; and in the social world of clothes and conversation we are doing the oldest sort of things in the newest sort of way.

In the mummy room of the British Museum, among the relics of a dead empire, is the skeleton hand and wrist—the catalogue says—of "a society lady of about the reign of Thotmes III," the nails dyed with henna and the wrist bones encircled by a bracelet. With some changes of scene and costume, more or less, the play goes on now as then, and the fundamental passions that make the play a comedy or a tragedy are the same now as then.

And life is still a lottery, as Voltaire said it was, "where the lucky tickets are rare and the grand prize of continual happiness was never won by anybody," just as it always was.

SOCIALISM.

Schemes for remodeling society on a socialistic basis by the confiscation of property by tax or otherwise and the abolition of the laws of inheritance run back to the days of old Lycurgus and "the Republic of Plato."

The communistic idea found expression in the Hebrew hierarchy with its Sabbatical seventh year and its fiftieth year of jubilee; in the communistic life of monasteries, where prince and peasant were equal in their cells; in the uprising of 1381, led by Watt Tyler, and inspired by John Ball, of Kent, the Lollard follower of Wyckliff, who urged that "things will never go well in England so long as goods be not common and so long as there be villeins and gentlemen," and put the everlasting question, "By what right are they whom we call lords greater folk than we? On what grounds have they deserved it? Why do they hold us in serfage?" "When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then the gentleman?" [Applause.]

It spoke again sixty-nine years later in the "Complaint of the Commons of Kent," presented by 20,000 Kentish men, headed by Jack Cade, who promised his followers that all lands should be held in common; that wealth should be degraded and poverty abolished; that seven half-penny loaves should be sold for a penny; that the three-hooped pot should have ten hoops, and that it should be felony to drink small beer.

It expressed itself in the so-called "modern scientific socialism," generated out of the ferment of ideas about property and the State and the origin and objects of civil society in France, which characterized the last half of the eighteenth century, and culminated in the work of a group of French philosophers known as the "Encyclopedists," who represented the reaction of mind against the rotten barriers of old conditions.

It expressed itself in the writings of Rousseau, who defended barbarism against the civil state so well that Voltaire wrote him: "One feels disposed to walk on all fours when one reads your work;" in the writings of Mably and Morelly, who taught that "good legislation should be continually decomposing and dividing the fortunes which avarice and ambition are continually laboring to accumulate;" in the teachings of Babeuf, who taught that "the aim of society is happiness and happiness consists in equality;" in the social experiments of Robert Owen and the speculative philosophy of St. Simon and Fourier; in the French revolution of 1848, when the dream of the social millennium with which men had deluded themselves turned to a nightmare of blood and horror.

It expressed itself in the plans for the subversion of society promulgated by Karl Marx and Ferdinand Lassalle, approved by many socialistic congresses, but of late modified by socialistic success in Germany to a programme of progressive social reform, which has divorced anarchy and proposes the transformation of society as it goes along toward the ultimate appropriation of lands and property, the repudiation of all debts, public and private, and the substitution of State for private ownership.

This is the last phase of socialism, unless we include the scheme of Mr. Bryan, which is in harmony with it, to smother the vital principles of the Republic by supplementing the present city and State control of public utilities by Government ownership of railroads, and the creation thereby of a political machine, having railroad and office-holding affiliations, which could control the course of legislation and hold the balance of power in any election.

Men have been groping for centuries for some solution of the unequal distribution of talents, wealth, and power, but the wisdom of the ages comes back again and again to the explanation that each is held accountable for what he makes of what is given to him—that talent, wealth, and power demand their usury in human conduct; that thrift and idleness, sagacity and stupidity, sobriety and drunkenness, genius and mediocrity, honesty and dishonesty are paid in their own coin; but, assuming a Supreme Intelligence which cares, and not an unchanging law that does not care, the ancient question of why men are born weak, unfortunate, and criminal still remains unanswered.

INEQUALITY BUT BROTHERHOOD.

Sir, nothing will ever be able to reduce the fundamental and organic differences of mankind to any dead level of equality.

Freedom is still "broadening slowly down from precedent to precedent," but this very freedom gives greater rein to natural differences.

And these same differences have forced men on from barbarism to the intellect that weighs the stars and studies the forces that flash through space. [Applause.]

From the time when force gave way to intellect in the world every addition to science and every new idea has contributed to the advancement of mankind, not of some, but of all; not of the rich and the fortunate alone, but of the poor and the unfortunate.

But it has not advanced all equally.

"Business interests" are selfish interests necessarily, but there never was a time when business interests realized and responded to their obligations to society more generously than now.

In the year 1907 the gifts to religion, education, and charity in the United States amounted to $150,000,000.

Sensitive scientific instruments 7,000 miles away recorded the earthquake shocks at San Francisco, but human sympathy the world over was still more sensitive, and the evil elements in San Francisco stand out in sharper contrast and blacker infamy against the background of universal generosity.

Recent criminal instances do not characterize or even qualify the true standard of our civic virtue, and the sun in its daily journey never shone upon a more generous and philanthropic people than our own or a people of higher national morality.

Mankind has not ceased to make war, but patriotism has widened into altruism, and our relations with Cuba, China, and the Philippine Islands has been characterized by a spirit of brotherhood which the world has never witnessed heretofore.

The nineteenth century began with cruelty and intolerance and the occasional individual temporary relief of mendicancy and ended with organized benevolence and humanitarianism.

Philanthropy is now a part of the complex unity of our social life. It has reformed the prison systems of the world. It visits the sick and the unfortunate. It builds homes, hospitals, and refuges for the old, the sick, the infirm, the deaf, the dumb, the blind, the insane, and all those with whom fate or chance or destiny has dealt unkindly.

But it needs to be remembered that it is not organized benevolence dispensed by proxy—not the founding of charitable institutions alone—not the giving of money flung from the lavish hand of plenty that helps on the brotherhood of man, but it is the spirit of sympathy with which all these things are done and bestowed.

THE WEB OF LIFE.

So long as the work of the world is done by average men—and "there is not a purpose or project or plan but depends on the strength of the average man"—and so long as the products of the work of the average man are multiplied by the talents of exceptional men, all are indispensable, and all are entitled to the reward.

There are some qualities the world can never get too much of and is always willing to pay for, and these qualities are intelligence, courage, and honesty.

The affair of capital is the affair of mankind, and the affair of labor is the affair of mankind, and it is not an impossible dream that the time may come when labor and capital, no longer on guard against mutual aggression, shall work together for their good and the common good, recognizing that when a business is prosperous, everybody connected with that business is prosperous, and when a business is not prosperous, nobody connected with that business is prosperous.

But so long as combinations of capital and labor exist, it ought to be clearly understood that they are the servants of the people, and not their masters, and must be subject to wise regulation and control.

And it can not be possible that all our work under the sun counts for nothing when we are done. I prefer to believe that—

"Whatever thy task, thou art even as one who twists the thread and throws the shuttle, weaving the web of life. Ye are the weavers, and Allah, the merciful, does He not watch beside the loom?" [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, in the last few months the newspapers of our country and of Europe have frequently contained descriptions of alleged atrocities in the Kongo Free State. Since the entrance of the United States upon the arena of world powers our people have an interest in subjects of this nature measured by our weight and influence in international affairs. There are those who believe that these newspaper articles are inspired by powers not wholly disinterested in the premises. On three continents within this decade we have seen instances where alleged atrocities or wrongdoings in the internal affairs of weak nations have been used as an excuse for active or armed intervention by their more powerful neighbors, resulting sometimes in large increase of territory for the latter at the expense of the former. Bearing this in mind, it is interesting to read the account of the Belgian administration of the Kongo Free State written by a most recent visitor to that country. The book From the Niger to the Nile contains a narrative by Lieut. Boyd Alexander, of the British army, of his three years just passed in and about the territories of the Kongo. Lieutenant Alexander did not go down there at the behest of a yellow newspaper nor of a "muck raking" magazine, but was the leader of a most notable scientific and exploring expedition for his Government. He pays the highest compliments to the Belgian officials, and completely disposes of any sinister suggestions of atrocities upon the natives by the Belgians or with their connivance. His picture of the true state of affairs in this great empire, in "Darkest Africa," shows the Belgians to be among the foremost colonizers and administrators of the civilized world and most humane and righteous in their dealings with the negro races. To quote his own language (Vol. II, p. 338):

Before leaving the Kongo I will take the opportunity of saying a few words on the Belgian administration, which my prolonged stay in the country gave me many chances of studying. My observations, of course, only apply to the country through which I passed, which was the Welle region and the Lado Enclave, where the Belgian posts are numerous.

As a traveler it was always my object to get away from the influence of the posts as much as possible, and most of my time was spent in distant villages in the forest, where I went to make collections. After a short time I invariably gained the confidence of the natives, and I had many talks with the chiefs. I will cite one as an example. I asked a Mobatti chief whether his people liked the coming of the white man to his country, and he replied: "Since the white man has come we have no longer any fear for our women or property. Before his coming the chief next to me, who is stronger than I am, used to raid my villages continually. No man could travel from one village to another without going in fear of being waylaid and killed; but now we work for the white man and he is strong for all."

For the protection thus afforded them the Kongo government, like other administrations in Africa, imposes obligations upon the natives. These take the form of each chief supplying to the post of the district a certain amount of labor and produce, the latter varying according to the things his country yields, but it is generally plantains, rubber, or palm oil. The work for which his men are employed also varies; it may be rubber collecting, or canoe work, or carrying, but in every case the men are paid. Canoe men and carriers get 25 centimes a day, the value of which is taken out by the men in cloth from the magazine of the post.

In the Welle region the circulation of the Kongo State money is hardly known, and all pay is given in kind. The wonderful system of waterways by lightening the labor of carrying has enabled the Belgians to use trade goods to the utmost advantage. The natives are ignorant of cloth making, and so cloth to them is a valuable article, and for payment goes a much longer way than in many of our own colonies.

The Belgian system of labor organization is a sound one. The post is seldom if ever more than five days' distant from the next, which is an advantage for transport purposes, for five days' carrying is the limit that any one man should be called upon to do at a time. The commandant of each station keeps a roster of the chiefs in his district and the amount of labor that each has to supply; so when a transport is required from his station to the next, a chief is called upon in his turn for the men, who know exactly what is required of them.

It is admirable what a hold the Belgians have over the natives by always ruling them through their chiefs. I have seen as many as 500 men in a post ready for work at a few hours' notice, and I have also seen cases in our West African colonies where an official traveling through the country has had to wait a day or two before a resident could get him twenty-six carriers.

The Belgian native soldiers have their two parades a day in the station when they are not on escort duty, and they are never allowed to go into the villages unless under the charge of a white officer. They are recruited from the tribes of the district, and are generally sent down to Boma for their training. Each man has to serve for seven years, after which he may reengage if he likes. His pay is 25 centimes a day. At the end of the month he goes to the store of the post where he is allowed to choose whatever he likes in the way of cloth to the value of his pay. For his food he is given 5 "mitakos" per week, or 25 centimes, and he is also housed. For each month of good conduct he receives 1.25 francs toward pension, but this is forfeited should he incur a flogging of twenty-five lashes.

Each soldier is allowed one wife, who must do a certain amount of work in the post, such as sweeping, carrying water, or cutting up rubber. For this work she receives 1 franc per month, or its equivalent in cloth, etc.

Every Saturday it is a usual sight to see strings of women from the neighboring villages coming into the post, carrying bunches of plantains or small baskets of sweet potatoes, to be sold to the soldiers and other permanent hands.

Then when Sunday comes there are often large gatherings of chiefs, all dressed in their best clothes, who have come in to pay their respects and to talk with the chef de poste. It is certainly an interesting sight to watch the chiefs and their headmen sitting in front of the official's house, talking and laughing with the white man to their heart's content, sometimes, perhaps, airing a little grievance, which is soon satisfactorily settled; at others telling him the reason, maybe, of some custom existing in their tribe. Then a glass of claret is given to every chief, after which they take their departure.

The Bangala language, which is spoken by all the chiefs, and in many cases by the natives, too, has to be spoken by every white man who enters the service of the Kongo State. The effect of this has been far-reaching in establishing a better understanding between the native and the European, besides giving to the officials an intimate knowledge of what is going on in the country, and making the oppression of natives at the hands of their chiefs a much more difficult thing than it was formerly. It is, in the first place, to this system of knowing the language that the Belgians owe the strides they have made within the last ten years in opening up the country.

The obstacles that have had to be overcome were very great. The extraordinary number of tribes in the Kongo, many of which are fierce and intractable, like the Bangalas and Ababuas; others of low civilization, like the Momvu and Mombuttu; made the first step of civilization extremely difficult. Soldiers had to be recruited from the West Coast, among them Hausas and natives from Sierra Leone, who, not being of the country, committed acts of cruelty and pillage whenever they got the opportunity. Another source of trouble has been the employment in official capacities of men of different nationalities, with the result that there has been friction with at least one other nation.

The system of labor imposed upon the natives can have none but a good effect. It brings them into closer contact with the white man and civilization, and imbues them with a sense of responsibility. As long as the native is left to himself, so long will he sit outside his hut and occupy his time in staring into vacancy. In the forest regions the soil is so rich, and the chances of loss by plague or storm so few, that little husbandry is required of the native to grow his crops. But since the white man levies so much food from him it means he must increase his plantations, and so the country becomes richer in cultivation year by year. In so fertile a region it naturally follows that living is extremely cheap, and this must be borne in mind when we deal with the question of the payment of the natives. But, in spite of this consideration, it is my opinion that the rates are much too low, and should be readjusted. This applies also to the pay of the white official. On the other hand, in our own and the German West African colonies things have been carried to the other extreme. One shilling a day for a native soldier and 9 pence to a shilling for a carrier are, I consider, ridiculously high.

To sum up the result of my observations on the administration of the State, having regard to their knowledge of the country, their control of the natives and the condition of the tribes that come under it, the discipline of their soldiers, the finely built stations, and excellent transport arrangements, it is my opinion that the opening up of the Kongo places the Belgians in the front rank of colonizers.

I can not pass from the Kongo without saying a few words on the "atrocity" question. Were I to consult my own convenience I would rather leave the matter on one side as being one that has nothing to do with the objects of the expedition, for it is not a pleasant thing to have to stand, as my convictions force me to do, in opposition to many of my fellow-countrymen, who, in their crusade against the Kongo Free State, I know are actuated by their humane principles. I have read Mr. Morel's book, and as I read I was appalled by the horrors it describes. If such things be true, it is a terrible thing to think of that one could for a moment try to check the avenging hand. When Mr. Morel buckles on his armor and goes for the dragon that is oppressing the weak, it is with a force and fire that would be worthy of the patron saint of Englishmen, and one can not help admire and feel sorry to find oneself on the side of the dragon. But having seen what I have seen, it would not be right for me to refrain from speaking; besides my silence might be misconstrued.

We had exceptional opportunities for studying the effects of the Belgian rule on the natives. I myself and José Lopez spent a year in the rubber region, and for the greater part of that time were in out-of-the-way districts, living side by side with the natives; but though we spoke with the chief of every village we came to, we could not hear of a single case of "atrocities;" and Gosling, who spent the last six months of his life under similar conditions found his experience agree with ours. And this did not merely go to prove the absence of oppression, but also to show that the Kongo tribes as a whole are happier since the Belgian occupation. I say "as a whole" advisedly, for I must, in all fairness, admit that there are some tribes that feel the oppression of being made to work, and the military restraint that keeps them from eating up other tribes. But in the eyes of the interested humanitarian this misfortune should be outweighed by the advantages conferred on the more gentle natives who now have peace and prosper.

There is no smoke without fire, and I do not doubt for one moment that in the first days of the colony there were many terrible abuses. These things, alas! happen in the early history of most colonies where black troops are employed. How much more certain is it to have been the case in the Kongo Free State, where at first the soldiers and laborers were recruited from outside the colony, and the officials were and still are drawn from all nations, and so not imbued with the spirit of patriotism? When it is known that many of the tribes among themselves inflict barbarous punishments of mutilations, of which I personally have seen several instances, it is easy to see how wrong impressions can be formed. And the fact that many photographs of these things find their way to Europe labeled, and rightly so, "Kongo atrocities," shows how dangerous it is to accept this sort of evidence.

A case in our own experience may serve to show the reader what animus exists against the Belgians. In spite of the fact that nothing could have exceeded the kindness of Commandant Sarolea and the officers at Niangara in the sad circumstances of poor Gosling's illness and death, a report reached Khartoum that he had died of starvation in Belgian territory, with the natural result that the Anglo-Egyptian government sent a request to the commandant superieur of the Welle district to know if it was true. I was in Faraggi at the time the message came through, being very kindly entertained by the Belgians, although they themselves were suffering from a shortage of food, owing to their supplies having been stopped from Khartoum in consequence of the Bahr-el-Ghazel affair. When the Belgians showed me the message I blushed for shame.

No, the Kongo dragon is dead and it is unseemly to go on gibbeting the carcass.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss what is ordinarily termed the "ocean mail subsidy." In the brief time allotted to me I can not discuss this proposed legislation in all its aspects, but only one or two phases of same. It would be best to inquire at the threshold the character of this legislation. It is proposed to amend the act of March 3, 1891, which provided for our ocean mail service. In that act ocean steamers were divided into four classes, and the rate of compensation for carrying the mails was graduated for each separate class. It is only necessary now to refer to the first and second classes. It was provided that the first class should be of iron or steel screw steamships capable of maintaining a speed of 20 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather and of a gross registered tonnage of 8,000 tons. The second class it was provided should be iron or steel steamships capable of maintaining a speed of 16 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 5,000 tons.

The rate of compensation to be paid the steamers of the first class could not exceed the sum of $4 per mile and for the second class could not exceed the sum of $2 per mile for each outward voyage. The act of 1891 further provided that contracts could only be made with American steamships.

The bill under consideration (H. R. 4068) provides that there shall be paid to vessels of the second class the sum of $4 per mile, as provided for vessels of the first class, thus doubling the amount allowed to be paid under the act of 1891. The purpose of the bill, upon its face, is to establish routes to South America, to the Philippines, to Japan, to China, and Australia. This bill was referred to the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which I have the honor to be a member, and in turn referred to a subcommittee, which by a majority vote has favorably reported the bill to the full committee.

This reference of the bill to the Post-Office Committee would indicate on its face that its purpose was to promote and extend our ocean mail service; and if such was its primary purpose and the extension of such ocean service was necessary, such reference of the bill was proper, and your committee and this House would be justified in providing a sufficient appropriation to carry the ocean mails at the lowest rate.

Such, however, is not the purpose of the bill and there is no such pretense upon the part of its principal advocates. In the first place there are substantially no American ships already constructed and available for this service, and the object of this increased compensation is to furnish an inducement for the building of the ships and thereby furnish employment and profit to our shipyards. In other words, it is the same movement for ship subsidy which has been before this House at regular intervals for the past ten years. Because it is presented under the guise of providing ocean mail service and the appropriation is to be made under the Post-Office Department does not entitle this bill to any more favorable consideration than that which has been accorded in the past to the several ship-subsidy bills proposed. In truth it is not so meritorious, because heretofore its advocates have sought an appropriation directly out of the Treasury for reviving our shipyards and shipping, while in this bill it is proposed to take the amount out of the post-office appropriation, thereby increasing the amount necessary for maintaining this large establishment and at the same time increasing the deficit.

It would be interesting to trace the evolution of proposed ship-subsidy legislation during the past decade. The first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, during the early months in 1900, witnessed the descent of this hungry horde upon Congress. At that time a more favorable sentiment existed toward such legislation than at any subsequent period, and if a bill had been then drafted providing for new ocean mail lines and avoiding any opportunity of a Treasury raid, seeking simply to extend the postal service, with incidental encouragement to our merchant marine, it is probable that favorable legislation might have been obtained. On the contrary, its promoters and sponsors demanded legislation for the express purpose of benefiting certain steamship companies, but with no pretense of reviving generally our merchant marine or extending our ocean mail service. The inexcusable selfishness exhibited at that time aroused the country and created such a storm of criticism in the newspapers that its enormity was exposed and the entire country became prejudiced against subsidies of every kind. The promoters of the movement at that time and each session thereafter have presented bills to Congress.

Each year various modifications were made, less appropriations were asked, and the more discreditable features eliminated. This continued until the last Congress when a bill more moderate than any other was reported to this House and passed, but failed to become a law. That bill is substantially the bill under consideration except as before stated, the same object is sought to be accomplished under the guise of extending the ocean mail service. The subsidy bill of last session provided substantially for naval volunteers, for subventions to cargo vessels, and also for subventions for carrying the mails. Under that bill it was estimated that the net cost for the second year would be $1,677,000, which at the end of ten years would have increased to $7,682,000.

What is the evidence that sustains the proposition that this is a mere ship subsidy bill? A hearing upon this bill was had before the subcommittee of the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, at which time the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. McCleary, appeared, together with others. The argument of Mr. McCleary was to the effect that Congress ought to pass the bill because it was necessary in order to provide for the common defense. On page 43, he stated that in his opinion the foundation argument in favor of this measure was the necessity of having naval auxiliaries for the common defense.

On pages 6 and 7 of the hearings the statement is made both by Hon. W. E. HUMPHREY and by Mr. W. L. Marvin that there are no available American ships on the Atlantic Ocean which could contract for this service, but that such ships would have to be built. It was further stated that substantially there were no ships upon the Pacific coast for this service and most of them would have to be built. On page 12, of the hearings, it is stated that if this bill is enacted into a law it will add about forty new steamships; sixteen on the Atlantic coast and twenty-four on the Pacific coast. I quote these statements of the advocates of this legislation in order to further sustain the proposition that the object of the bill is twofold: First, to furnish a pecuniary inducement for the building of forty steamships, and second, for providing an equal number of naval auxiliaries. It is claimed that capital will not be invested in the construction of steamships in our shipyards and that our yards will not be given the contracts for building these ships unless this subvention or subsidy is granted to them. On pages 34 and 35 of the hearings it was sought to have the Second Assistant Postmaster-General rest his demand for this increased appropriation upon the necessity of enlarging the ocean mail service, but he declined to do so and placed it upon the grounds above named. It was admitted in the hearings by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, on page 26, and by the Commissioner of Navigation, Mr. Chamberlain, on page 33, that our ocean mail could be carried much more cheaply than under the present bill if the service was open to competition to all the world.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] made a speech in the House a few days ago for more than an hour in advocacy of this bill. This speech gave ample evidence of research and careful preparation, and the purpose running all through his remarks was to show the decline in American shipping in the foreign trade and to urge the necessity of this increased appropriation as a means of inducing the building of additional ships in American yards to engage in foreign trade and incidentally to carry the ocean mails proposed in this bill. It was an argument entirely appropriate and suitable in advocacy of a ship subsidy, without reference to the postal service. Though my time is limited, I hope I have made plain the proposition that this is simply another subsidy bill attempted to be "sugar coated" and under the guise of extending our ocean mail. If any gentleman upon either side can point out to me, either in the hearings before the committee upon this bill or elsewhere, any evidence that such is not the primary purpose of the bill, I shall welcome an interruption in order that such evidence may be furnished. [Applause.]

I would not be misunderstood in this matter. I do not contend that the compensation for the carrying of mails can be regulated by any arbitrary rule. It is frequently true that in some sections and by some methods the cost of carrying the mail between any given termini must be greater than the revenue therefrom. This is true of many star routes and steamboat routes in our domestic mail service, which supply the mails in sparsely populated sections. There is scarcely a rural route in the country where the receipts equal the cost. There are some railway routes, where, because of sparse population or rapid transit, large amounts are paid. But in all these instances the primary purpose is to transport the mails, and not to maintain steamboats or railroads. The fact that the same was paid by the Government and enters into and forms a part of the revenue of the steamboats or railroad lines is simply an incident, and does not affect the principle involved.

Inquiry has been made as to how much this will increase the annual expenditure for our ocean mail. This amount can only be approximately estimated, and the friends of this bill in the hearing estimated that it would increase the cost annually about $3,600,000. If a steamship line was established from the Pacific coast to the west coast of South America, the additional amount was estimated at $4,000,000. It may be safely stated that these are mere estimates and represent the minimum sums.

It was asserted the other day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] that the net annual revenue at present from our ocean mail service amounts to about $3,600,000, and therefore the increased sum made necessary by the enactment of this legislation could be met out of the net revenue from the ocean service. There are several pertinent comments which might be made in answer to this argument. First, it may be stated that the great bulk of revenue from our ocean mail service comes from the trans-Atlantic service from New York and other eastern cities to England and the ports of the continent of Europe, and that no profit could arise upon any proposed routes from the Atlantic ports to South America or on the Pacific.

In the next place, the amount of net revenue so stated can not be arrived at by any proper method of computation. As pointed out so clearly the other day by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], this alleged net revenue is computed by deducting the cost of the service from the gross receipts of the ocean service. The great bulk of ocean mail originates from points far interior, and this computation does not take into consideration the cost of forwarding such mail to the seaboard, neither does it consider any part of the cost of administering the mail service. These propositions are substantially submitted by everyone, and if properly considered they will serve to reduce materially the alleged net revenue from the ocean mail service.

In further answer to the suggestion that we may use the net revenue for the purpose of this legislation, there is another answer which can not be controverted. If the main purpose of this legislation, as has been pointed out, is to subsidize ships in the foreign service, then it can make no difference whether the increased appropriation comes out of the net revenue from the ocean service or whether it is derived from an original appropriation out of the Treasury. The principle is the same. It is the object of the legislation which is vicious, and, being so tainted, it can not be removed or made legitimate by taking the money from any particular source. With all due respect to those who differ, this seems to me to be the only consistent and logical conclusion. [Applause.]

Before I conclude I beg the privilege of saying a word with reference to American shipping in our foreign trade. I admit that only about 10 per cent of this trade, which has grown to such ample proportions during the past few years, has been carried in American bottoms and under the American flag. I would be untrue to my obligation as a Representative if I did not express the keenest regret over this deplorable condition. I would welcome the return of that splendid era in the past when American money, skill, and courage spanned the seas with American ships and carried our flag in triumph to every port, and if by any appropriate legislation this condition could again be created, I would cheerfully aid in such restoration. I am not willing, however, to pay the price demanded by the advocates of this bill. I am not willing that subsidies shall be paid directly out of the Treasury or paid under the guise of carrying the mails, as proposed in this legislation. If I could favor either plan, I would regard the direct method as less reprehensible than the indirect plan proposed.

The present law provides that no vessel is entitled to American registry and to sail under the American flag in our foreign trade unless such vessel or steamer was built in America. It is contended that we can not build steamers as cheaply as they can be built abroad, and therefore the advocates of this legislation ask for an appropriation to supply this deficiency to the owners of American shipyards. The object may be commendable, but the method is subversive of the basic and essential principles upon which our Government is founded. The moment we begin to appropriate money to aid or sustain any mere private industry, at that time we enter upon the most radical and dangerous policy which it would be possible to describe. [Applause.]

There is only one method by which we may restore our merchant marine and by which we may get South American trade from our European rivals, and that is to remove the cause which brought about the present conditions. Let us remove the commercial barricades which have been constructed around our country by the prohibitive Republican tariff. Unless we can both buy and sell and import and export upon equal terms with our competitors we can not hope to do a profitable business. Foreign trade is a matter of reciprocity in its best sense. We must buy as well as sell, and we must do both upon equal terms with our rivals. Our present boasted foreign trade as to our exports is made up, in the main, from shipments of our farm products, of our mineral and forest products, all of which we get from the soil, and only a small proportion comes from manufactured products. After pulling down the tariff barriers, then give our American merchants and manufacturers an opportunity to do their trading in free ships. These are the true remedies for the restoration of our merchant marine, and if they shall not prove ample, then any deficiency may be supplied by discriminating duties and favorable considerations extended to exports in American ships. [Applause.]

This bill will yet come before this House for consideration in one form or another. It is said that the leaders of the majority have promised this legislation. I respectfully warn Members against this subterfuge. Members who represent constituencies which hold to the cardinal doctrine that taxes can not be collected from the people and be appropriated except for public purposes can not support this legislation without violating what appears to me to be a plain and substantial duty. This is a subsidy bill. Let no one take to himself any hope or consolation to the contrary. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for interruption?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Is the provision in this bill the usual appropriation that we have passed heretofore?

Mr. SMALL. It is intended as a subsidy, and so admitted by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in his argument before the House Post-Office Committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Does this bill carry $4,000,000?

Mr. SMALL. This bill will carry about $4,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. In addition to what we have paid heretofore?

Mr. SMALL. I have not the figures before me as to the amount we are paying now. It is an addition of $4,000,000 to that which we are paying, and for the admitted purpose not of carrying the mails, but as a subsidy to the merchant marine.

Mr. GARRETT. Do you mean it is in the post-office appropriation bill?

Mr. SMALL. Not in the post-office appropriation bill, but it is intended later to be brought before this House for consideration.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, for want of time I shall not attempt a close analysis of the post-office appropriation bill, now under consideration. Generally, I may say that the bill as it has been reported to the House by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is less objectionable to the members of the committee than any similar bill presented during my service in Congress.

For the information of the country it may not be out of place to make some comparisons. In 1900 the total appropriations for the support of the postal service amounted to $105,627,138.75. The present bill carries $220,766,192. In my opinion, a number of items are too small in amount and others are too large. However, I am only one of eighteen members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and it is a fact that close scrutiny was given by the committee to all items going to make up the bill.

This leads me to digress somewhat. It is commonly reported in the press and generally believed by a great majority of the people in this country that the Senate of the United States is a deliberative body and that the House of Representatives is not. I am not one of those who indorse the rules of the House which give to the Speaker and his three Republican colleagues on the Committee on Rules the absolute government and control of the House. I do not propose, however, to discuss at present this phase of the question.

Revenue bills, under the Constitution of the United States, must originate in the House of Representatives. Custom and practice has brought it about that all appropriation bills shall also originate in the House of Representatives. The Senate consists of 92 members; the House of 391. It is evident without argument that in the House of Representatives there is less than one-fourth of the time for debate by the Members individually that there is in the Senate, and then, when it is considered that the appropriation bills, amounting to nearly a billion of dollars at each session of Congress, originate in the House, are prepared in the various committees of the House, hearings are had, the items going to make up the same carefully scrutinized, and full reports are made showing the necessity for the appropriation—consider this work in connection with the consideration given to appropriation bills in the Senate, and the conclusion is easy that the time of the House is largely taken up in the preparation and consideration of appropriation bills, and it is patent to all who wish to know that the Senate gives no such consideration to appropriation bills in the matter of preparation or time.

The time has been when the Senate of the United States passed seven great appropriation bills in one day, and it is sometimes the case that the post-office appropriation bill is reported to the Senate after short consideration, so that it is true that in matters of appropriation the House of Representatives gives the closest attention, analysis, and consideration to all bills and that the Senate does not.

If I may be permitted, I will say that this is as it should be. The Members of the House are elected directly by the people, and it is proper that the House of Representatives should hold the purse strings of the nation. It follows that in general legislation, the enactment of new laws outside of appropriation bills, the Senate has infinitely more time and is able to give larger consideration to all such legislation than is the House of Representatives.

I am constrained to make these remarks for the reason that many uninformed people do not understand or do not care to know why it is that equal time and the same consideration is not given to matters of general and permanent legislation in the House that is given to bills of this character in the Senate of the United States. I am unwilling that the House of Representatives shall be criticised without a statement at least of conditions leading to this state of facts.

To illustrate, three months of the present session of Congress have passed. At the beginning of the present session the reports of the Post-Office Department and the Secretary of the Treasury were available to members of the Post-Office Committee, and it was necessary that they study these reports before entering upon the long and tedious labor of preparing the Post-Office appropriation bill. Since Congress convened after the holidays, two months ago, the various subcommittees of the Post-Office Committee, and particularly subcommittee No. 1 having in charge the preparation of the bill under consideration, have until the past few days been in almost daily session; that is to say, the members of this subcommittee have practically speaking been three months in the preparation of this bill. It is evident to all that during these three months the eight members composing subcommittee No. 1 of the Post-Office Committee have had time for no other work. As this is true of the Post-Office Committee, it is also largely true of many other committees, such as the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs, and many other committees I might name. The time of the members on these committees is taken up in this way.

With apologies for this digression, I will now proceed to discuss some items of appropriation in the bill under consideration. It is my opinion that there is appropriated for the screen-wagon service at least $150,000 more than is necessary. This is brought about by placing the underground electric-car service in the city of Chicago under this head. The pneumatic-tube service unquestionably costs more than the good of the postal service demands. The same is true of the appropriation for star-route service. Eight years ago in the Congressional district I represent, consisting of seven counties and with an area of more than 4,500 square miles, there was the star-route service and the country post-offices. In the past six or seven years the district has been practically covered by rural-delivery service, and where there were approximately 200 post-offices there are now 95. Where there were scores of star routes in the district, to-day there are only 10. This should be the case throughout the country generally where the rural-delivery service has been extended. To my mind this service will never be brought to a proper basis until both star-route and rural-route services are placed under the same bureau. As it is to-day the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General has control of the rural-delivery service; the Second Assistant Postmaster-General has control of the star-route service. Both should be under one management. The Second Assistant's office would have enough to do without having anything to do with the star-route service. At no distant day I hope to see this branch of the postal service transferred to the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

I do not make these remarks by way of criticism of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's office. It is, however, impossible to properly manage and control the expenditures in the matter of star-route service so long as the same is under a different jurisdiction to that of rural-delivery service.

In the last Congress a law was enacted and provision was made for increasing the salaries of postal employees by nearly $13,000,000. Railway mail clerks were given an increase of $100, rural carriers on standard routes $180, clerks and carriers in first and second class post-offices were given classification and automatic promotion up to $1,000 in second-class offices and $1,100 in first-class offices, based alone on one year's service and efficiency of service in the next lower grade.

There is one matter, however, in connection with this that I am not satisfied with, and it is this: That up to this time the Post-Office Department has formulated no rules or regulations as to what standard of service shall constitute efficiency of service. The practice at present is to take the statement of the postmaster at first and second class post-offices as to whether or not the clerk or carrier in his office has made good from a standpoint of efficiency. Now, the clerks and carriers are under civil-service law. The postmaster is usually, and I might say almost without exception, a politician, so that we have this abominable condition, that a politician who happens to be postmaster passes upon the record of post-office employees, clerk and carrier, and as a general rule there is no appeal. However, there is some hope that this condition will be remedied before a great while, the sooner the better, in my judgment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. After the election, I suppose?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not know when it will be done, but I have the promise of a gentleman high up in the postal service that this will be done.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Upon what line does the gentleman recommend a change to be made in order to bring about the reform that he speaks of, namely, the promotion of clerks for efficiency, so as to do even and exact justice to all?

Mr. FINLEY. I would have the Department make rules and regulations defining the standard of efficiency in the postal service for clerks and employees who are under civil-service law. That can be done. And most assuredly I would give the clerks and employees the right of appeal in every case where they claimed that an injustice had been done. Rules and regulations can be formulated that will govern this matter properly.

One other matter that has provoked discussion and some criticism is that the law does not provide automatic promotion for clerks and carriers in the second-class offices in the $1,000 grade, nor in the first-class offices in the $1,100 grade. Under the law and practice Congress makes or does not make a lump-sum appropriation for the promotion of postal employees in these grades. Of course there is always contention as to how many and what per cent of employees in these grades should be promoted each year.

Provision is made in the pending bill for the promotion of about 15 per cent of the clerks in the $1,100 grade, a percentage too small in my judgment. And why should the $1,000 grade in second-class post-offices be discriminated against?

I know of a first-class post-office where a cashier is needed, where in addition to the business of the office nearly 700 rural carriers' pay certificates are handled, and there is not in this office a single employee of the rank and pay of cashier, and I doubt very much whether in the distribution of the small appropriation provided for in the bill that this office will receive consideration.

Continuing along this line, I am convinced that the amount provided for clerical assistance to third-class post-offices where the salary is less than $1,600 is insufficient. The law provides that at third-class offices where the salary is $1,000, $1,100, and $1,200 per annum there may be an allowance for clerical assistance to the amount of $200, and where the salary is $1,300, $1,400, and $1,500 an allowance of $300; where the salary is $1,600 and $1,700 an allowance of $400; where the salary is $1,800 and $1,900 an allowance of $500 each year.

Under the pending bill, where the salary is $1,600, $1,700, $1,800, and $1,900, provision is made for an allowance for clerical assistance approximating 92 per cent of the maximum allowance, and where the salary is less than $1,600 the amount appropriated will only give something like 60 per cent of the maximum permitted by law. I believe it would be for the good of the service to increase these amounts to the maximum.

I am in doubt as to whether or not a sufficient sum is provided for the rural-delivery service during the next fiscal year. I shall not go into an extended discussion of the merits of rural delivery. My views and opinions have undergone no change. Since I have been in Congress I have seen this appropriation grow from something like $350,000 annually to more than $35,000,000 in the pending bill. I am firmly convinced that this is the best investment the United States Government has ever made. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Has not the gentleman heard complaints from the substitution of rural-delivery routes for star routes where the post-office has been abolished?

Mr. FINLEY. No doubt such complaints have been made, but they have not come directly to the committee. Something was said about them in a recent hearing.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Has not the gentleman found that a good deal of confusion has resulted to the people from the substitution of the rural delivery for the star routes?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that my experience is—I do not know that it tallies with the experience of others—that when a district has adopted the rural free-delivery service, where the star route was in existence, and also the country post-office, it was bad policy to plaster the rural delivery on top of the star-route service. I have found it bad policy to have a rural free-delivery route and the star-route service and the country post-office together. The people should decide for themselves which they wish. Under the ruling of the Department they can decide it for themselves.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What I mean is, where a post-office is known to you in your district and the star-route service has been discontinued by the establishment of the rural free-delivery route and the post-office on the star route has been abolished, you do not know where the mail is routed from. Why should it not be for the agent to route it and not disturb the post-office?

Mr. FINLEY. In some districts that trouble might arise.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But the gentleman's experience might not be the experience of people generally.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand that perfectly well, but there surely can be no long-continued trouble on that score. There might be some trouble at first, but it would be of short duration.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. May I make an inquiry of the gentleman?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman remembers that back in 1902 the rural carriers were allowed to carry express packages; that in 1902 we limited the right in this language:

> The carrier shall be permitted to do an express package business, provided it does not interfere with official duties.

And in a later act, which the gentleman helped to make as well as myself, it was provided:

> Such carriers may carry merchandise for hire upon the request of the patrons residing on their respective routes whenever the same shall not interfere with the proper discharge of their official duties.

Mr. FINLEY. I am always delighted to be interrupted by the gentleman from Tennessee, but I beg to say to him that I have only a very few minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am sorry, but I know the gentleman can explain this. The Department now limits that to those parties who live on the route. A party, for instance, residing in Nashville, wants to send out a Christmas present to a person on this route. He can not do it, but the person on the route can do it. Now, we can increase the salaries by making that more liberal.

Mr. FINLEY. I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that that would inaugurate a general parcels-post system.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not necessarily; we could limit it. The whole thing is a creature of statute.

Mr. FINLEY. So it is. I want to say that I am heartily in favor of a parcels-post system on rural-delivery routes.

But I stated a moment ago that I had some doubts as to whether or not the appropriation provided in this bill is large enough. The Department, under existing law and appropriation made at the last session of Congress, proposes to install during the present year 1,500 rural routes. Provision must be made in the pending bill to pay the salaries of these carriers during the next fiscal year. The estimate is that $1,293,000 will be required for this purpose. The estimates of the Department also provide to inaugurate new service on 1,500 routes during the ensuing fiscal year, and that $700,375 will be necessary to pay the salaries of the carriers on rural routes installed during the next fiscal year. The Department also estimates to pay substitutes for 39,200 carriers on vacation during the next fiscal year that $1,352,100 will be necessary, and for clerks in charge of rural-delivery service $12,000, and tolls and ferryage $15,000. On this basis $35,872,693 will be necessary to support the rural-delivery service during the next fiscal year. The pending bill only provides $35,373,000. During the past fiscal year the rural carriers, to some extent, neglected to take advantage of the fifteen days' vacation, thereby saving to the Government on this item alone $187,313. During the present fiscal year the rural carriers have taken their vacation to an amount equal to $870,000 in the eight months of the fiscal year that has gone by, leaving only $484,000 for the four months of the year unexpired. This shows conclusively that practically no saving can be expected on account of carriers not taking their vacation during the present and next fiscal year.

One other consideration. The amount carried in the bill does not contemplate the establishment of 1,500 rural routes this fiscal year or during the next fiscal year. The argument is made that during the present fiscal year the average has not been as much as 125 routes per month. I call the attention of the House to the fact that four months of the time past during the present fiscal year—November, December, January, and February—the weather has been inclement and the roads throughout the country generally in bad condition. On March 2, 166 routes were installed, and my recollection is that 132 routes are ordered installed April 1, and I am satisfied a larger number will be installed during the remaining months of the fiscal year, so that the average will be at least 125 routes per month. The Department may inagurate 1,650 routes during the present year.

I did not have the time to give this matter close consideration in the committee room, for the reason that during the last few days the post-office bill was under consideration before the Post-Office Committee of the House I was absent in South Carolina attending the funeral of the late Senator Latimer. I do not wish any unnecessary appropriation for the support of the rural delivery or any other branch of the postal service. I am satisfied, however, that the figures given are correct.

There has been a great deal of agitation throughout the country in reference to parcels post on rural routes. I have advocated this proposition as strenuously as I could elsewhere. I did what I could to secure favorable action in the way of amendment to the present law by amending the bill, on page 52, after the word "year," on line 4, by adding the following:

That beginning July 1, 1908, there shall be a parcels post, limited to 12 pounds, on every rural route in the United States. Said parcels post shall be confined exclusively to the rural route upon which the parcel originated and its rural-route connections, and shall not extend beyond said route upon which its originates and routes with which said route connects directly without the intervention of railway mail service, star route, messenger, or any other form of mail service.

That the rate of postage on such packages shall be 5 cents for packages weighing not more than 3 pounds, 7 cents for packages weighing not more than 5 pounds, 10 cents for packages weighing more than 5 and not more than 8 pounds, and 15 cents for all packages weighing more than 8 and not more than 12 pounds, and the money received for this service shall be paid to the rural carrier performing the service of carrying the parcels or packages.

My amendment embodies the bill of Judge GRIGGS, of Georgia, with an amendment giving the rural carriers the fees received.

This amendment of the general law is necessary for the convenience and accommodation of people living on rural routes. The service will cost the Government nothing and will give to the rural carriers who perform this service the compensation paid by the sender of a package or parcel. I have advocated the measure heartily and regret that the Post-Office Committee has not seen fit to favorably report the same.

There is one class of public servants who are entitled to more compensation at the hands of the Government than they at present receive. I refer to fourth-class postmasters. This numerous class of public servants are overworked and underpaid. I hope to see legislation enacted in their interest at an early date. In the event this is not done the failure to do so can be charged up to the majority.

Mr. GILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. GILL. The gentleman stated just now that he was in favor of the rural parcel-delivery system.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. GILL. Has he any objection to stating why he would not extend that to the cities as well as to the rural districts?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say this to the gentleman in answer to his question: That if you should extend this system to the cities you would have to double the letter-carrier force in every city in this country, and I do not think there is the necessity for this service in the cities that there is in the country on the rural routes.

Mr. GILL. I would ask the gentleman if he is familiar with the number of carriers that are utilized, for instance, in the city of London, and whether they have there double the number at the present time that there is in New York, in proportion to population?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. GILL. They have the system there, and why could they not have it in New York?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that they have no such well-paid or efficient mail service in London as we have in the city of New York.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not recall that they have more daily carrier deliveries in London than they have in New York City?

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, I have heard that statement made often; but they have all they wish in New York City—up to eleven a day.

Mr. GOULDEN. And thoroughly efficient.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; the most efficient in the world.

Mr. Chairman, on last Tuesday my colleague on the committee [Mr. GOEBEL] made an earnest plea for ship subsidy. He stated that House bill 4068, to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to provide commerce," had been referred to Subcommittee No. 4, of which he has the honor to be chairman, and that this bill has been favorably reported by Subcommittee No. 4 to the full committee. The Post-Office Committee, however, has taken no action in reference to this bill. I assume that the reason why Judge GOEBEL has not called up this bill before the full Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is that he is aware of the fact that an unfavorable report was likely. Under ordinary circumstances I should not discuss the proposed bill. The provisions embodied in said bill are not carried in the post-office appropriation bill now under consideration, but since the chairman of Subcommittee No. 4 of the Post-Office Committee has seen fit to argue the proposition at length in the discussion of this bill, I think something should be said on the other side of the question.

It is sought by the proposed bill to so change the law as to saddle the postal service with the burden of ship subsidy. The purpose and the only purpose of the postal service should be to carry the mail, and I believe that the postal service should be maintained strictly within these limits. From any standpoint, why should this service be loaded down with the burden and expense of service other than for this purpose? We have an ocean mail service at present, but it is, strictly speaking, a mail service. Not only is this true, but it is a profitable mail service, and this proves the scope of the service beyond cavil. The proposed change in the law is nothing more nor less than the old ship subsidy bill revised, revamped, and put in shape to be attached to the postal service, and, if possible, without alarming the public.

The ship-subsidy proposition has for its main purpose the extension and building up of the American merchant marine, providing ships in which to carry American products to foreign countries and to provide an auxiliary fleet of cruisers and colliers to the American Navy in time of war. Now, the present ocean mail service that we have is strictly for carrying the mail, and results in a profit, whereas the proposed law contemplates building up a merchant marine at an estimated annual expense under bill H. R. 4068 of about three and a half million dollars. Not only is the purpose of the bill to build up the merchant marine, but it is also intended to increase the naval strength of the United States by providing transports in time of war, and, as I have stated, all of this at the expense of the postal service.

If the Republican party wishes to be fair, and unless it is proposed to deceive the country into the belief that the proposed bill is in the interest of the postal service, when, as a matter of fact, it is not, why does the Administration in the White House and in Congress not come forward with a proposition as was done years ago for a ship subsidy pure and simple, with its purposes and objects clearly stated and unequivocally avowed.

In the nine years that I have been in Congress I have heard many speeches on bills to give the country a ship subsidy. I remember distinctly the efforts of that distinguished, stand-pat, able, and fearless Republican, Gen. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio. He is a Republican without guile and the strongest advocate of ship subsidy I have any knowledge of. During his twenty years of service here, and in recent years when he was chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, he did his utmost to secure favorable action by Congress for this proposition. He did it, however, in a plain, straightforward, open, fighting sort of way. He plainly stated the purposes of the various bills introduced and advocated by him to build up the American merchant marine, and at no time to my recollection did he ever resort to the present method, which I regard as a cowardly subterfuge in endeavoring to saddle the postal service with this expense.

We all know, or at least those who know anything about the postal service are well aware, that whenever any unnecessary burden is imposed on the postal service that you cripple the service in more ways than one. That, among other things, you make it impossible or difficult to accomplish at least the extension of the postal service, the inauguration of new and up-to-date innovations for the good of the service, and particularly is it true that whenever action like this is taken the postal employees suffer, for the reason that consideration of their claims for reasonable compensation is necessarily postponed.

The ship-subsidy proposition is nothing more nor less than an effort to apply the protective-tariff theory of stand-pat Republicans to the ocean carrying trade of the United States. The domestic carrying trade of the United States on the Great Lakes and rivers and between the ports of the United States is absolutely protected. This is a local matter and American shipowners have no competition with foreigners, but in the ocean carrying trade the American shipowner comes in competition with the foreign shipowner. So it is that he must compete with the shipowners of England, Belgium, Germany, France, Japan, and other nations. The American shipowner claims that in this trade he can not compete with the shipowners of other nations on account of the protective tariff of this country. I am prepared to admit this proposition. A ship costing $1,000,000, built in England, Japan, or elsewhere, will, on account of the Dingley tariff law of this country, cost from one and a half to two million dollars here. The ship-subsidy proposition proposes to give to the American shipowner a bonus or subsidy out of the Treasury of the United States to make up the difference—that is, to pay to him at least a fair return on the cost of approximately one-half the price of his vessel. A real remedy would be to reform the Dingley tariff law. It is claimed that at one time over 90 per cent of the American ocean trade was carried in American bottoms, and to-day less than 10 per cent is carried. This statement is also true. When practically all of the American ocean carrying trade was in American bottoms, this country had a reasonable tariff law for revenue.

To-day this country has a most unreasonable and unjust tariff law for the purposes of protection, and results in enriching the few at the expense of the masses. Under the present tariff law of the United States a ship-subsidy law which would restore the American merchant marine would cost the Treasury of the United States anywhere from $80,000,000 to $90,000,000 annually. This money would be contributed by all of the people and be paid out as a bonus or subsidy to a few shipowners. I am opposed to the ship-subsidy proposition in every form. To my mind the proposition is indefensible from every view point. It means nothing more nor less than that where a business is unprofitable on account of the protective tariff that parties engaged in this unprofitable business shall be authorized to go to the Treasury of the United States and receive enough money to make their unprofitable business profitable, in utter violation of Jefferson's definition of democracy, "equal rights to all; special privileges to none." The fact that it costs twice as much, practically speaking, to build a ship in this country as it does in England or continental Europe is the reason for this onslaught on the Treasury of the United States.

Why the bill discussed by my colleagues should be sent to the Post-Office Committee I am unable to understand.

When General Grosvenor, of Ohio, that simon-pure, rock-ribbed, fearless Republican entered into a discussion of this proposition, or any other proposition of interest to the Republican party, he made his fight, as I have stated, openly and aboveboard and without resorting to a subterfuge, as is the case with bill 4068.

In former Congresses, even when the Republican majority exceeded 100, the ship-subsidy proposition was either pigeonholed or was permitted to die. At any rate it was never passed. The present advocates, with their former defeats staring them in the face, being apprised of the fact that in all probability a large number of the Republicans in this Congress, as in other Congresses, would rebel and refuse to vote for ship subsidy unless the same was labeled some other name, have resorted, in my opinion, to what is an indefensible and cowardly subterfuge to accomplish the same purpose. Bill 4068 gives to ships engaged in ocean mail service $4 per mile, where the same ships under the existing law are only entitled to $2 per mile on outward trips. There has been a studied effort at covering up the real purposes of the bill, but in the hearings before subcommittee No. 4, of which I am a member, it was made evident that the real purpose of the bill was to build up a merchant marine and provide an auxiliary fleet to the Navy. The mail service which it is proposed to supersede under the provisions of the bill mentioned only costs annually $188,000, and the expense under the bill mentioned will amount approximately to $3,600,000, and perhaps a great deal more.

House bill 4068 has not been brought for consideration before the full Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. There are at least four Republican Members on the full committee who, on former occasions, as I remember, when the ship-subsidy bill was before the House as a separate proposition, voted against the same. I hope that they have not changed their views, and that the reason why this most iniquitous measure has not been brought before the full committee is that it is not believed that favorable action can be had. No Democrat, in my opinion, can or will vote for the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No Republican who is opposed to special privileges, to taking money out of the United States Treasury in order to make a private business profitable which is now unprofitable, can possibly vote for the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No man, in my opinion, who has at heart the good of the postal service can possibly give favorable consideration to this proposition. It is unsound as an economic question to saddle the postal service with the burden of ship subsidy. Every man who so votes will be compelled to answer that question to the people. If the Administration—Republican party, if you please—is determined to pass a ship-subsidy bill, why not come out in the open, make their fight in the House and Senate, and go before the country with a declaration of their principles and cupidity, holding to the proposition that it is necessary to grant special privileges to American shipowners and to give them a very large appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States at the expense of the whole people?

I have not a great deal of fear that the House will favorably consider the bill mentioned, and I would not mention the same in this discussion but for the fact that the gentleman from Ohio, chairman of subcommittee No. 4, having the bill under consideration, and a member of the Post-Office Committee, has discussed the measure fully. Can there be any doubt that the main purpose of the bill is not for the good of the postal service?

Hon. James T. McCleary, Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and for many years a distinguished Member of this House, and who is also a tariff reformer of a very high order, differing from most tariff reformers in this, however, that he believes that the tariff should be reformed upward and made as high as it is possible to make it. And in this connection I wish to digress long enough to state that he is one Republican who is honest, open, and speaks his sentiments on all occasions. In the hearings before subcommittee No. 4 of the Post-Office Committee, in advocating the passage of the ship-subsidy bill mentioned, he stated this as one of his reasons:

> That the Union was formed for one reason, fundamentally, and that was for the common defense; all other reasons are secondary. Peace is our normal condition; we love it—but we must not forget that we are liable to have war. * * * Now, all this is preparatory to what I want to say. We must provide for the common defense; that is a national duty. How can we do it? * * * We must have two kinds of forces, land forces and ocean forces. We depend upon our citizen soldier for our reserve. * * * On the sea we must have the same general policy; we must have a proficient force; we must have fighting ships of the very best quality. In addition to the fighting force we must have what I will call (I do not know that I use the technical language) "an auxiliary force" of scouts and colliers and hospital ships and supply ships and all of those things. Here is the problem with which we are face to face. How shall the Government secure that auxiliary naval force at a maximum of efficiency and a minimum of cost?

Speaking of providing ships for this service, General McCleary stated:

It is a legitimate public expense which the Committee on Appropriations could properly appropriate for directly out of the United States Treasury as the cheapest way of accomplishing a great result.

It will be borne in mind that the proposed bill involves an outlay of something like $3,600,000, where the outlay at present is only $188,000.

In the hearing General McCleary was asked this question:

Mr. FINLEY. Taking your statement as you have made it, have you not argued this committee out of jurisdiction?

Mr. MCCLEARY. No; because you have jurisdiction of the postal offices and this furnishes means with which to accomplish the result.

Mr. FINLEY. But would not a bill to accomplish the purposes you have stated properly go before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. MCCLEARY. No; I should think that if it were to go anywhere else than here it would go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FINLEY. That was the thought that struck me when you were making your statement.

There can be no question of the purposes of the bill H. R. 4068, and the intent of the promoters of the bill. It is simply to saddle the expense of ship subsidy on the postal service.

This country is great in every way. Particularly in its citizenship, accomplishment, material wealth, and, I may add, in appropriations generally for the support of the Government, and particularly for the support of the postal service. Its material wealth amounts approximately to one-quarter of the wealth of the world, and, as I remember, our expenditures for postal facilities amount to more than 30 per cent of the total expenditures for this purpose by all the nations of the earth.

I am not a pessimist. I have faith in the people and believe that the progress and development of the country is best assured by the showing made by the postal service. The receipts from this source are the surest indications and constitute the very best business barometer to be had. Recepits and expenditures in the postal service have practically doubled within the past nine years. Nine years ago receipts amounted to a little more than $102,000,000. The recommendations of the Post-Office Department have not been carried out by the Post-Office Committee in the preparation of the bill under consideration by something like $9,000,000. The reason given for this generally by the majority of the committee was that we have a panic on and that there will necessarily be a falling off in revenues and in demand for increased service. This falling off has not amounted to much as yet.

In all of my experience in Congress—nine years—this is the first time I have heard Republicans cry panic. The only song I have heard from them heretofore is that panic and Republican rule do not go together; that a Republican Administration means prosperity of a high order and continuous duration. Often I have heard my friends on the other side of the aisle tell of the hard times under the second Cleveland Administration, and then in grand peroration exclaim that Democratic rule must of necessity result in panic. I remember particularly the tale of woe told by one of my Republican friends as to how during Cleveland's last Administration he was compelled by the stress of the times to eat clams—to eat them and to eat them to such an extent that his stomach rose and fell with the tides. I would like to know what diet he has been regaling himself on during the past six months. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I should say that it is about clam time again. One thing is certain, the Republican Members of this body no longer sing of prosperity caused by the Republican party being in power. Republicans now claim that panics, like death and taxes, must come.

At any rate, we have a panic, the most far-reaching that some sections of this country have as yet experienced. I may say, however, in passing that this Republican panic has not affected the postal revenues, as it otherwise might, for the reason that there is no real cause for panic. It comes at a time of profound peace, when the country was never more prosperous in its fields, mines, and industries. It comes at a time when there was never so much money in the country—in fact, when the circulation per capita is greater than ever in the history of this country. It comes at a time when the stock of gold in this country exceeds a billion of dollars. It is a panic brought on by reason of the distrust with which the masses of the people in this country have come to regard the Government, and they regard it with distrust, high and low, rich and poor, because the Government is in the hands of the Republican party.

The panic of 1891 to 1897 was widespread. The present panic is only as wide as the rule of the Republican party and only extends where the blighting effects of that misrule reaches. I go one step further and state that this Republican panic, confined principally to this country, has been more severe and more disastrous in its consequences in those States where the Republican party is in power. We felt it to some extent in my State, but not a bank closed its doors; not a single failure resulted in South Carolina to my knowledge on account of it. It has come about that on account of the policies and practices of the Republican party, including the close connection between the Government and special interests, the people are in a condition of panic. That is, they have lost confidence in the Republican party. There will be an end to this. In November next the people will have a say. Republican orators and politicians may disclaim responsibility for the panic, but the fact is the panic is on. You claim that the way to end this panic is to reelect your party to power. I tell you that the people of this country are not fools. The panic being caused by misgovernment on the part of your party, how can the people expect to better conditions by giving the Republican party a new lease of power? Puffed up with success and pride of power, you have in the past called attention to the soup houses, workmen without work, and distressed conditions generally during the last Democratic Administration. It is with sorrow for the condition of the laboring classes and poor people in the great industrial centers that I call attention to the fact that there are probably 1,500,000 people out of permanent employment to-day, all on account of your panic. In the great cities in this country during the present winter thousands have been fed by the hand of charity.

Confidence will be restored, but it will not be until the people have had their say in November. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. And what about the full dinner pail?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the full dinner pail song has served its purpose. I do not think that in this year of grace we will hear any song of that tenor. What the song will be I do not know, I can not surmise, but I will say this, that the Republican politicians are—to my mind—about the smartest on the face of the earth [laughter], and they will sing a song that will suit if they can find one. What it will be generally I do not know, but I am satisfied of this, that no matter what their song is, not matter what pretense they give for the Republican panic that is now on, the people will answer them not with applause, but with an emphatic declaration at the ballot box restoring this Government again to the hands of the Democratic party, the party of the people, the party that will administer this Government in the interest of all the people. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNON].

Mr. BANNON. Mr. Chairman, all of the Democrats and some Republicans now contend that our tariff schedules ought to be revised. Many public men high in the councils of the nation are now advocating tariff revision and have been for some time pressing it as an issue. Others have opposed their views. Accordingly this question of protection has now entered the arena of agitation, and its friends must come prepared to combat with its enemies.

Protection is not a local issue, but is a great national question, and the individual who considers it purely from a local standpoint is like a man attempting, from some lofty mountain top, to view the beauty and grandeur of the scenery about him through the wrong end of a spyglass. The lens at his eye dwarfs his view. As protectionists we must not take any such view as that of the question, but must study it in all its ramifications and in all its relations, not only to ourselves but to the wage-earners and factories of the East and North and to the farmers and miners of the South and West. The free trader of the South objects to the principle of protection because his community is an agricultural one and because, as he claims, a tariff is a system of taxing the farmer for the benefit of the manufacturer. Out in Ohio our farmers take a different view of this question, and their contention is that this great system is so connected with all the business of the country and all of the sections of the country that it is a great benefit to all, and that when the industries of the North and East are running on full time and the wage-earners therein employed are paid good wages the products of the farm are in greater demand and bring better prices. That great protectionist, Blaine, clearly stated the proposition when he said:

The Western farmer's instinct is wiser than Mr. Gladstone's philosophy. The farmer knows that the larger the home market the better are his prices, and that as the home market is narrowed his prices fall.

And, accordingly, as long as Congress, in preparing this revenue and protective measure, deals fairly with the manufacturer, the wage-earner, and the farmer it will receive the earnest support of the agricultural interests. The farmer is the great producer of raw material. All wealth must come from the soil—it is the very foundation upon which the entire superstructure is erected and upon which it must stand.

This country is irrevocably committed to the principle of protection, and if those clamoring most for revision would only consider that such is the settled policy of the country the question of revision would be approached with less danger to the business of the country.

Massachusetts is a great manufacturing State, and naturally many of its manufacturers urge free raw material for consumption in their industries. But the farmer and the mine owner who produce this free raw material have their rights. Their interests are large, and, where possible, compensatory duties for their protection should always be levied. Statistics show that industries using agricultural materials employ 37 per cent of all the persons engaged in manufacture, and that the capital of these industries is 42 per cent of the capital of all manufacturing establishments. One of the free raw materials persistently asked for, especially by the shoe interests of Massachusetts and some other States, is cattle hides; and it is my purpose to-day to discuss in some detail that question with you.

As near as I can analyze the situation, there are in Congress three contending forces on this question: Representatives from districts where there are large manufactures of leather goods and very little agriculture want free cattle hides, but a high duty on the output of their factories; Representatives from Southern States wish to remove the duty from both the manufactures of leather and the raw material from which this product is made, and Representatives from those districts which embrace agricultural or both agricultural and manufacturing interests favor a retention of the duty on the raw material and the retention of the duty on the manufactured product as well—the former to be a compensation for the latter.

I am one of those who contend that we should protect the factories and the wage-earners engaged in the manufacture of leather goods and also the farmer who is engaged in the production of the raw material consumed in those factories.

In the Fifty-ninth Congress there was a very significant colloquy between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and a distinguished Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. It is so interesting and so clearly states the proposition that I will read it:

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman from Missouri support a proposition for free hides coupled with a proposition to take the duty off the products of leather?

Mr. CLARK. So quick that it would make your head swim.

Mr. GARDNER. At all events, then, we have a valuable ally.

Mr. CLARK. You have got me right now on that. Senator LODGE, as I understand it, advocates repealing the tariff on hides, because "it is such a little one," two million and something. Now, if they will go the whole hog up there and remove the tariff on boots, shoes, and leather, we can come to an agreement and pass it through this House.

It will be observed that the gentleman from Massachusetts did not commit himself or his constituency to the proposition offered by the gentleman from Missouri, and, so far as I know, no person has been authorized on behalf of the manufacturers and wage-earners to accept the latter's proposition.

In the same Congress similar questions and answers passed between Senators from Massachusetts and Wyoming:

Mr. LODGE. Suppose the duty on boots and shoes were removed, would the cattle raisers, the farmers, who are interested in the duty on hides, then consent to a removal of the duty on hides?

Mr. WARREN. The farmers and stockmen, in my opinion, are not seeking for a removal of the tariff on leather or on boots and shoes; they stand for that tariff as well as for the tariff on hides.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Wyoming spoke of that as a compensating duty, which, of course, it is.

Mr. WARREN. I maintain that, of course.

Mr. LODGE. What I wanted to get at was whether the Senator felt that if one tariff was removed the other should also be removed?

Mr. WARREN. I intend to come to that, Mr. President, but I will now answer the Senator from Massachusetts in a word, by saying that I do not believe in removing either one. But if the tariff on hides is removed we must, as a matter of course, remove the tariff on leather and boots and shoes. This would be only simple justice.

The Senator from Massachusetts is too faithful to the grand old Commonwealth of Massachusetts and this nation to commit her people to such a programme.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] also stated the same view in the following language:

"We are, therefore, not willing to put hides upon the free list to enrich your boot and shoe manufacturers unless you, speaking for your boot and shoe manufacturers, will agree at the same time to reduce the duties upon the finished product, so that the women and children of the South and West may buy shoes cheaper."

The Texas Stockman and Farmer for January 25, 1905, speaks in a similar vein when it says:

Resolutions demanding of Congress immediate repeal of the 15 per cent duty on hides were unanimously passed last week at the annual meeting of the New England Shoe and Leather Association. The Stockman and Farmer desires to say to the Shoe and Leather Association of the New England States, and to the manufacturers of those States generally, that the people of the West and Southwest will see to it that the import duty on hides, wool, and pelts will never be removed unless the import duty also comes off of all goods manufactured from these products.

I am opposed to the proposition for three reasons: First, it would deprive the farmer of a duty in his behalf; second, it would prove disastrous to the great industry of manufacturing products from leather in this country; and, third, it would throw thousands of wage-earners out of employment and materially reduce the wages of those few who would remain at work in this industry.

The farmer is the greatest consumer of leather in this country. He wears out more shoes, more harness, and more saddlery than any other class of our citizens. He produces the raw material from which these leather articles are made, and a tariff of 15 per cent ad valorem is levied for his protection upon the cattle hides imported into this country. The only hides upon which a tariff is levied are the hides of cattle, and a cattle hide is one which when green and salted weighs more than 25 pounds, or dry weighs more than 12 pounds. All weighing less are denominated as calfskins. Horsehides, goat, sheep, kangaroo, and calfskins are all admitted free of duty, and the reports of the customs-houses show that in value three-fourths of the hides now imported are admitted free of duty, and that a tariff of only 15 per cent is paid on but one-fourth of the quantity now imported. This tariff not only protects the farmer but it yields a large sum in revenue for the support of the Government, the amount being two and a half or three million dollars annually. From 1842 until 1873 a duty was levied on cattle hides varying from 4 to 10 per cent, but in 1873 this duty was removed and they were admitted free until 1897, at which time the present tariff of 15 per cent was levied.

It is often asserted that the farmer does not get the benefit of the compensatory tariff on hides but that the beef packers are the beneficiaries. If hides were an unimportant, insignificant by-product of but little value this would probably be true. But they are not. It has been admitted, and every farmer knows, that the value of the hide is equal to one-fifth of the value of the animal. The hide from a steer selling in the market at $40 will bring $8; and during recent years the average value of each hide has been about $6. We slaughter annually approximately twelve and a half million head of cattle, and the hides of these animals are worth at least $75,000,000. If 15 per cent of their value is to be taken away from the farmer it means an annual loss to him of more than $11,000,000.

The boots and shoes worn by the residents of the cities and the people of manufacturing communities are not made from cattle hides. The only parts of the shoes worn by them made from cattle hides are the soles and the heels, because the uppers of the shoes worn by these classes are made of kid, calf, kangaroo, or goatskins and horsehides. The farmers are the ones who wear boots and shoes made exclusively from cattle hides, and a careful, accurate computation of the amount of the duty in the soles and heels of the shoes worn by others than the agricultural classes shows that it is less than 2 cents per pair, and that the duty on the hides in the shoes worn by the agricultural classes does not exceed 5 cents per pair. Heavy boots are no longer worn in this country to the extent they were formerly, and the dealers in them will tell you that but one case is sold now where formerly twenty-five were sold.

The cattle-hide duty contained in a double set of harness is about 50 cents. If there is added by this tariff to the price of one class of shoes 2 cents per pair and to the price of another class 5 cents per pair and to farm harness 50 cents per set, who pays the most of this? Manifestly it is the farmer, because he is the greatest consumer of these articles, and the duty levied in his behalf is simply compensatory to him; and if the manufacturer of leather goods is to be protected in his thrift and industry, and the wage-earner engaged in that work is to be likewise protected, it is simple justice to extend the same protection to the farmer who raises the raw material which these wage-earners and these factories fashion into the finished product. No other basis would be equitable or fair with respect to these three interests.

I am not willing to give up the duty on articles manufactured from leather in consideration of the surrender of the 15 per cent duty on hides, because such course would materially cripple the manufacturer of leather products in this country. Our boot and shoe manufacturers are protected by a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem, and our manufacturers of harness, saddles, and saddlery are protected by a duty of 45 per cent ad valorem. Our tanneries are protected by the levying of a tariff on all tanned and finished leather imported into this country; so are the manufacturers of leather trunks and valises. All these industries have made progress beyond the dreams of the most optimistic. In 1905 there was invested in the manufacture of leather in this country almost $243,000,000, and the value of the product for that year was more than $252,000,000. In the same year there was invested in the boot and shoe industry almost $123,000,000, and the value of its product was more than $320,000,000.

The proposition confronting us is to remove the protection now thrown about these great industries. I am proud of the progress that has been made by those who have built up this wonderful hive of industry. They have shown what American skill and American energy and American genius can do, and these industries do not want, and the people of this country do not want, to bring them into competition with manufacturers abroad whose products are produced at much less cost than ours. The removal of these duties would strike down many an industry in this country and would only be attended with disaster and distress.

I object again on account of the effect that this proposition would have upon the American wage-earner. The average number of wage-earners employed in 1905 in the manufacture of articles from leather and its finished products was 255,000, and there was paid to them in wages during that year more than $116,000,000. The amount of the wages paid during that year to those engaged in making boots and shoes was more than $69,000,000. The question is, Are we going to bring those men and that pay roll in competition with the workmen and the pay rolls of foreign countries?

The following extract from a recent issue of the Birmingham (England) Daily Post is of interest:

> Kettering shoe trade dispute.—A dispute having arisen in the shoe trade at Kettering, the local arbitration board referred to the board of trade the demand of the National Union of Boot and Shoe Operatives for an increase in the minimum wages of lasters and finishers from 26s. to 30s. per week. Judge Austen, of Bristol, the umpire, has decided against any alteration. The minimum at Northampton and Bristol is 28s., and at Stafford, Leicester, Wolverhampton, London, and St. Albans 30s.

It will be seen from this extract that the wages paid lasters and finishers in England is about $7.50 per week. The statistics compiled by the Census Office in this country show that the general average paid to shoe lasters in the United States during 1906 was $17.36 per week, the average for Massachusetts $19.25, and the average for Ohio $19.14. Now, I do not know what you think about it, but, as for me, it seems plain that if we do not continue to protect American labor in American factories who are earning an American wage, we will bring them into competition with their competitors in foreign lands who are now receiving but a little more than one-third as much as our operatives. This Massachusetts and the country will never do.

In a report made on leather and boots and shoes in European markets by a special agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and published last year, I find the following:

> It has been said, and truly, that the American shoemaker is the best fed, the best paid, and the most skilled in the world, and, as a result, the excellence and popularity of his product is advanced in all countries.

If our wage-earners are now the best in the world and the best taken care of in the world, we propose to maintain that standard.

It is also stated in that report that the cost of production in France, as in England, is much less than in the United States. In Belgium the laborer in the shoe factories begins his toil at 6 in the morning and ends at 7 in the evening. His wages average from 7 to 9 cents per hour, with 25 per cent increase for additional hours, making his daily wage from 84 cents to $1.08 for twelve hours' work. In that country children begin their life work at the age of 12 years, and under the law there a child under 16 years of age can be kept at work twelve hours a day.

The foreign wage-earner engaged in this business not only receives much less for his labor than the American workman, but he is neither fed as well nor clothed and housed as comfortably as our workman, and he can not bring to his family the comforts of life or any of the luxuries that are now so generally enjoyed by American operatives.

The removal of this tariff would bring our people into direct competition with the poorly paid workmen of Europe, and that is one principle that is not in the creed of the Republican party and one thing which that great protective party will never do.

But notwithstanding the fact that it costs Americans more to produce boots and shoes in this country than it does abroad, nevertheless our foreign trade in these articles has increased steadily since 1891, as the following table will show:

Exports of boots and shoes.

Year.	Pairs.	Value.
1907	5,833,914	$10,663,949
1905	5,315,699	8,057,697
1904	4,642,531	7,238,940
1901	3,494,041	5,526,290
1900	3,016,720	4,726,656
1899	1,934,277	2,711,385
1898	1,307,031	1,816,538
1897	1,224,484	1,708,224
1895	822,412	1,010,228
1894	647,318	777,354
1893	493,027	590,754

It will thus be seen that under the Wilson and McKinley bills, which left cattle hides on the free list, our exports of boots and shoes were in value during the best year less than one and three-fourths millions of dollars, while under the Dingley bill, with a tariff of 15 per cent ad valorem on such hides, our exports of these commodities have reached an annual value of more than ten and a half million dollars. This is certainly proof conclusive that this tariff has not hurt our foreign trade. American shoe manufacturers are now sending their shoes to sixty different countries. Many of these countries levy a duty upon the shoes imported from America. Notwithstanding the fact that it costs more to produce shoes in America than it does in Europe, we are nevertheless entering largely into the foreign trade because our labor is the most skilled in the world and because it produces shoes that are everywhere sought on account of their durability, comfort, style, and finish, for, as is said in the special report before referred to, "the American manufacturer has not to convince the English buyer of the superiority of the American shoe—the Englishman already knows that." In other words, we have sold abroad on the merits of our products and not on the pauperism of our wages. Our home trade has been so great that we have not been obliged to seek a larger export trade; but if the occasion should require it and the American manufacturer should choose to invade the foreign market with these goods and will look closely to the details of climatic conditions, packing, and advertising, he will soon be the maker of high-grade shoes for the world.

In 1906 our shoe exports for the first time in our history exceeded in value the shoe exports from Great Britain. Not only have our exports of boots and shoes increased largely, but also our exports of leather and its manufactures have increased, as the following table will show:

Exports of leather and manufactures of leather.

1904	33,980,615
1901	27,923,653
1900	27,293,010
1894	14,283,492
1893	11,912,154
1892	12,084,781

These exports have doubled in value under the protective tariff on cattle hides.

The manufacturer of leather goods, like all the manufacturers of our entire country, have practically free raw materials for the goods which they manufacture for export. This is due to the "drawback" clause, so called, which has been a part of our last three tariff acts. By virtue of that provision an American manufacturer can receive back from the Treasury of the United States any duty he may have paid upon the materials used by him in the manufacture of articles exported by him. This provision is not only a Republican or protectionist measure, but a Democratic or free-trade measure as well, for it was incorporated not only in the McKinley and Dingley bills, but in the Wilson-Gorman law also. Under its operation it is possible for a small percentage of the goods manufactured in America to be sold abroad for less than they are sold at home, because, if advantage is taken of the drawback, the cost of manufacture for export is reduced.

But Congress is urged to remove this tariff on cattle hides, because it has increased their price to such an extent as to make the price of leather burdensome to the manufacturers. I have shown you the great development of this industry in this country. Men of my acquaintance have gone into that business with but little money, but much brain and energy, as capital, and have made for themselves and their families great fortunes; and they have not done this by oppressing their labor or robbing the consumer, but by bringing to their work that skill and intelligence not possessed by any other people of the world. The great State of Massachusetts is the first in rank in every item relating to shoe manufacture. In 1905 it produced almost half the total output of boots and shoes for this entire country.

In that year the amount of capital employed in that industry was almost $50,000,000. The number of its salaried officials and clerks was almost 3,500, the number of its wage-earners more than 62,000, the amount of wages paid more than $33,000,000, and the value of their products $144,000,000. Between 1900 and 1905 all these various items increased materially, and this industry has been and is in a most prosperous condition or it would not have made the steady and marked advance it has made. And I might say right here that whenever you undertake to convince an Ohioan that a manufacturer in Massachusetts is doing business at a loss you are tackling the biggest proposition that you ever went up against.

At the close of the year 1906 Mr. L. B. Cahill, president of the Cincinnati Shoe Manufacturers' Association, writing in the industrial edition of the Cincinnati Times-Star, said:

Cincinnati shoe manufacturers enjoyed during the past year one of the most prosperous seasons of their history and broke last year's fine business record. This phenomenal prosperity was in spite of the fact that leathers have advanced from 20 to 40 per cent on account of the extraordinary demand. There is no surplus of leather. It is taken up as soon as produced. The 20 per cent tariff on certain hides should be taken off by all means. The leather "trust" must not be blamed for the advance, which has been the result of natural causes. Cincinnati produced about 50,000 pairs of shoes daily the past year, or 15,000,000 pairs, worth more than $40,000,000. More than $20,000,000 is invested in the business, and the past year saw much more money put in the industry at Cincinnati. A number of plants have outgrown their old quarters and are now building new factories. Cincinnati is one of the largest producers of kid shoes in the world, and is rapidly gaining in prestige. The products of her factories go all over the world and made new conquests the past year. The plants will be worked to their utmost capacity the coming year, which will be one of the busiest in the history of the shoe trade. Orders for next year are in, and 1907 is going to be a record smasher. This is not merely a guess, but is definitely known, because the shoes are already sold. The labor situation is quiet and satisfactory. Wages have been advanced. There have been no strikes.

It will thus be seen that Ohio has enjoyed the same prosperity in this manufacture that has been enjoyed by Massachusetts.

I have an interesting advertisement of a great shoe company, in which it is stated that the company was formed fourteen years ago by a young man whose entire capital was $1,500 and a practical knowledge of the shoe business. It states that in fourteen years his small original investment has grown into a business whose tangible assets and good will are now worth more than $5,000,000.

Now, we have made all this advancement and accomplished all these wonderful achievements, produced the best shoes in the world, paid our labor the highest wage in the world, supplied our home market in the leather trade to the amount of about $400,000,000, and invaded foreign markets to the extent of many millions more, and all in spite of the fact that a little duty of 15 per cent has been levied to protect the farmer who consumes the most of these products and the farmer who furnishes these manufacturers with the raw material from which their finished product is made. Surely we ought to stop and ask ourselves if the farmer has not been modest, indeed, in his demands.

But it is claimed that this 15 per cent tariff has largely increased the price of leather. I do not believe it has influenced it to any great extent. It may affect the price of leather, but not to a greater extent than 15 per cent, and the price of hides has increased much more than this. You must remember that there has been an extraordinary demand for leather. It is being used more generally and extensively than ever before. The production of saddlery and harness in 1905 increased almost 30 per cent, and leather belting and hose 40 per cent. The amount of leather used in automobiles alone is astonishing. It takes from two to three hides to complete the leather fittings in every automobile, and when you consider the thousands that there are, the enormous demand for leather for this purpose will be appreciated. The 15 per cent duty on raw cattle hides did not cause the high price of leather, because the price of calfskins, which are on the free list, has increased proportionately with those of cattle.

A study of the export of hides is of interest:

Year.	Pounds.	Value.
1907	15,396,806	$1,760,032
1906	10,752,827	1,223,255

During the years 1895, 1896, and 1897 when the industries of this country were idle and our farmers were receiving low prices for their grain and the wage-earners were paid small wages and our consumption was small, we exported about 35,000,000 pounds of hides each year. But with a return of a protective tariff and new conditions and the opening of our factories and the revival of agriculture we kept our raw material at home and did our own manufacturing and sold to our own people and paid wages to our own wage-earners, and for six years our exports of this raw material were about 10,000,000 pounds annually.

In 1904 we exported more than 32,000,000 pounds, but this demand was caused by the heavy war demands on account of the war in South Africa and the Russo-Japanese war. The high price of hides prevailed not only in America, where the little 15 per cent duty was levied, but it prevailed in free-trade England as well, and, in fact, was universal; and that the price was neither unreasonable nor caused by the tariff is shown by the fact that our manufacturers not only paid the price in this country, but those in foreign markets paid the same price as well.

I know the price of hides and of leather interests the manufacturer, but that the high prices prevailing in the past have not been caused by this 15 per cent is further shown by the following:

Year.	Sole, hemlock, Buenos Ayres, middle weights, first quality (price per pound).	Sole, oak, scoured backs, heavy (price per pound).	Green, salted packers' heavy native steer hides (price per pound in Chicago).
1890	$0.1921	$0.3771	$0.0933
1892	.1727	.3421	.0870

1895	.2073	.3421	.1028
1898	.2129	.3213	.1151
1899	.2254	.3358	.1235
1900	.2490	.3608	.1194
1901	.2475	.3525	.1237
1902	.2367	.3800	.1338
1903	.2207	.3742	.1169
1905	.2290	.3663	.1430
1906	.2538	.3796	.1543
1907, December	.26 to .27	.37 to .40	.1185

It will be seen from a study of this table that the price of oak soles does not bear any fixed proportion or ratio to the price of hides, and because hides have slightly increased in price it does not necessarily follow that leather must advance also. Hides are to-day cheaper than they have been for years, yet the duty has not been removed.

Those who are contending for the removal of the duty from the raw hides of cattle tell the maufacturer of leather goods that such action will give him increased profits on the output of his factory. This was done to interest him in the project, and it usually has the desired effect. They then tell the wage-earner employed in the same factory that if this tariff is removed the price of the raw material necessary to make the finished product will be decreased, and the result will be that he will get an increase in his wages. Naturally that interests him. But they do not stop there. They go to the retail dealer in leather goods and tell him that his profits as a retailer will be increased if the duty is removed from raw cattle hides. But that is not all. They take another step down the line, and they tell the consumer of these commodities that he will be able to buy them at a largely reduced price if this small duty is removed.

I have shown you that this duty is so small that it can not appreciably affect the retail price of commodities that are manufactured from leather. Suppose it is 5 cents per pair on brogans; this small amount can not be given to the wage-earner and the manufacturer and the retail dealer and the consumer. If you give it to one of them, manifestly you can not give it to the other three; and if it is divided among these four classes it becomes a matter so trivial that it is not worthy of consideration; it becomes absolutely nothing to them. I challenge you to give me the name of a single manufacturer who has made a definite promise that if this duty is removed he will increase the wages of his employees and reduce the price of his products.

I presented this argument to show you how dangerous it would be to accept the proposition that has been made to the protectionists of this country by free traders to surrender the 15 per cent duty on a certain raw material in consideration of the surrender of a larger duty on the finished product. To do so means to throw tens of thousands of American wage-earners out of employment. It means to shut down hundreds of factories all over this country, and it means silence in the workshop where now there is the hum of industry. It means a decreasing market for the products of the farm; it means impaired confidence; it means a vital blow at two interests—the one agricultural, and the other manufacturing—that are now working in harmony for the mutual welfare and benefit of both.

What I have said of this raw material can be proven of any other raw material if you will just take the time to stop and study it out.

The great West and the South produce the raw material for the labor and the capital and the energy of the East to fashion into the finished product. We have joined hands with you and we have protected you against your foreign competitor, and the wage-earners employed in your factories against the foreign wage-earners. We have made up by a duty the difference between the wage here and the wage abroad.

On the subject of free raw materials John Sherman, in volume 1, at page 191, of his Recollections, says:

> The dogma of some manufacturers that raw materials should be admitted free of duty is far more dangerous to the protective policy than the opposition of free traders. The latter contend that no duties should be levied to protect domestic industry, but for revenue only; while the former demand protection for their industries, but refuse to give to the farmer and the miner the benefit of even revenue duties. A denial of protection on coal, iron, wool, and other so-called raw materials will lead to the denial of protection to machinery, to textiles, to pottery, and other industries. The labor of one class must not be sacrificed to secure higher protection for another class. The earth and all that is within it is the work of God. The labor of man that tends to develop the resources buried in the earth is entitled to the same favor and protection as skilled labor in the highest branch of industry, and if this is not granted impartially the doctrine of protection proclaimed by the founders of our Government, supported for more than a hundred years of wonderful progress, will be sacrificed by the hungry greed of selfish corporations, who ask protection for great establishments and refuse to grant it to the miner, the laborer, and the farmer.

Speaking on this subject of free raw material, William McKinley said to the Home Market Club just twenty years ago:

> If free raw material will cheapen the product of the factory and of the mill, of course by the same logic the product of the mill will be cheapened if competing products are admitted free of duty. The products of the New England mills, the New Jersey potteries, and the Pennsylvania furnaces have no higher claim upon the fostering care of the Government and the considerate concern of Congress than the iron mines of the Northwest, the wool producers of Ohio and West Virginia, the coal of Maryland, the clay of Missouri, the salt of Michigan and New York, the marble of Vermont and Connecticut, and no unselfish patriot thinks so. I assure you there is no wayside station in the work of cutting down duties when once entered upon. No reason will be found, surely none will be accepted, why we should stop halfway in our so-called "mission" for the overburdened consumer. Protection will not respond to the beck of one interest and turn a deaf ear to the earnest calls of another. Seven and three-quarters millions of farmers, more than one-eighth of our entire population, will not tolerate a discrimination against their products, and that might as well be understood now. Our farming population has firmly resisted the seductive voice of the free trader; has stood faithfully by the system of protection because it was right as a broad policy looking to industrial independence. They only claim equal benefits with all others; more they have never asked and less they will not have. No advantage over their fellow-citizens engaged in other branches of business is desired, no unjust or unequal drawbacks or discrimination upon them will be tolerated.

And the same principles that were true when McKinley spoke twenty years ago are true to-day. We are not in conflict; we are in harmony; we must not be in conflict, but we must go on in our own way demanding our own rights and protecting the rights of others, and in this way we will continue to build up our country, and the America of to-morrow will be still greater and better than the America of to-day. If you attempt to deny to your neighbor protection on the coal and the iron and the wool and the other raw materials produced by him he will retaliate by seeking to deny to you the protection that is afforded you upon the products of your factories, and the result will be that there will again be want and hunger and cheerless homes in this country where there is now plenty and happiness and bright, cheerful firesides. Let us again resolve here and now that we will continue to protect all classes and all sections of this country equally, so that the protective system shall continue to be for the benefit of all. Let us know no South nor North nor East nor West, but let us realize the truth of that maxim, "United we stand, divided we fall."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, in delivering my address a few days since on postal conditions, in discussing the interpretation of the law as to the weighing of the mail, I failed to state the law on the subject, and I wish to do so now:

> The average weight to be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, at such times after June 30, 1873, and not less frequently than once in every four years.

Later the time was changed to ninety days. Otherwise the law has not been changed to this date.

Until March 2, 1907, the Department required the mail to be weighed for ninety week days. Sunday was not considered, so that the weighing covered a period of one hundred and five days instead of ninety successive days. In other words, working days were construed to mean week days. Postmaster-General Cortelyou changed this interpretation which had been accepted as correct for over thirty years and issued the following order as his construction of the law:

> That when the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes, the whole number of days the mails are weighed shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day.

This required, in effect, that, instead of dividing by the number of working or week days in the weighing period, the divisor should be the number of days on which mail was actually carried during the period. If it was weighed one hundred and five days, the divisor to obtain the daily weight was one hundred and five. If the mail was not carried on Sunday, the divisor would be ninety. This, as you can readily see, would give less compensation for carrying the full week than for six days, for the accumulated mail would be practically the same whether carried in six days or in seven.

The present Postmaster-General, seeing this predicament, issued another order of construction, known as "Order 412," which is as follows:

> That when the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day.

If the construction up to last year was right, then there has been withheld from the railroads this year over $1,700,000 that is theirs under the law. If the present construction is the proper one, the railroads have received over $70,000,000 since 1880 that belongs to the people; so that whichever view is sustained money has been wrongfully withheld through the Post-Office Department.

In the last Congress the chairman of this committee decided that an amendment proposed similar to Order 412 was new law, and on an appeal from the decision of the Chair the decision was sustained by practically a unanimous vote.

To remedy this embarrassment hereafter, I have introduced a bill which omits the word "working" and requires a continuous weighing for thirty successive days in each year. This would avoid any controversy about the divisor, and would also avoid the temptation to false routings of mail and excessive padding, as is now so frequently charged during the quadrennial weighing. The Government would pay for the mail actually carried and the railroads would receive compensation for every pound transported. [Applause.]

[Mr. WILLETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, as no other gentleman on this side desires to occupy any time, I ask for the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

For advertising, $5,000.

For rent of suitable buildings for the use of the Post-Office Department, including the mail-bag repair shop, lock-repair shop, and the division of supplies, $35,200. And $800 of said sum shall be immediately available.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the last sentence of that paragraph on the deficiency appropriation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, that is not a deficiency appropriation at all. The House authorized last year the rental of property in Washington for a supply station. One additional room has been added, and the $800 to be made immediately available is for the remainder of this year for that additional room. The supply station down on First street, near the Union Station, was found to be very advantageous, and a ten years' lease was entered into. During the present winter, by reason of some heavy supplies, it was found necessary to occupy one additional room on the ground floor. Such a room being available, the contract was entered into under the old authority at $2,400 a year, and we authorized the $800 immediately to be available in order to pay the rental upon that room for the remainder of this year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The point is simply this: They would not care to use the room at all unless they had means of paying for it. The authority for the rental existed under the law, and they had made a contract for all except this one room under that authority. It is quite common, Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman will probably recall, especially in the postal service, where authority is granted in midyear for some necessary rental, that the appropriation is carried for the remainder of the year, provided the contract is entered into at once.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are those items not carried in the deficiency bills?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; not at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have been carried in those bills?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; not that kind of an item. The deficiency bills, I will say to the gentleman, very frequently—in fact, almost annually—carry some items of an appropriation which has not been sufficient; but this is a new room, rented under authority, and $800 is for the rental of that room for the remainder of the fiscal year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All the other Departments of the Government, however, if they wish to obtain new service or additional accommodations are compelled to submit estimates, which are deficiency estimates, and it seems to me that this is an item of that character.

I withdraw the point of order on the gentleman's statement.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks and laborers at division headquarters, fifteen at $1,600 each; nine at $1,400 each; twenty-seven at $1,200 each; eight at $1,100 each; thirteen at $1,000 each, five at $900 each, and two at $660 each; in all, $96,620.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to know why these people, who are paid $1,600, are called laborers, and that there are different classifications of laborers? What is the idea of that?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The appropriation for laborers, Mr. Chairman, is simply for two at $660 each. The other employment is of clerks, and the ordinary labor incident to that character of work, who have been employed in these places from year to year.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Do these laborers get, for instance, all the way from $1,600 down?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Two of them only get $660, and they are the only ones who get the actual laborers' pay. The others are stenographers, clerks, and employees of that character.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and installation of mechanical conveyors and equipment for the handling of mail in the Washington City post-office, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, $10,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes a point of order against it, but I want to ask some questions about the bill.

Mr. MANN. I reserved the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I wanted was to ask the chairman of the committee a question or two about the bill. I would like to inquire where the Post-Office Department got the authority to issue the ukase that subscriptions to newspapers have to be paid in advance after the 1st of April or the papers can not be carried at the usual rate? That is one question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the gentleman want them answered one at a time?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; I want an answer to it, if the gentleman knows.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, that is a very large subject, and can scarcely be answered in the time that generally is allotted under this kind of debate. I do not recall the numbers of the statute, but under the statute fixing the rate of second-class mails at 1 cent a pound provision is made that the publications shall not enjoy that rate when they are published primarily for advertising purposes, and there are certain other limitations. It is under that statute. In speaking of the authority for the rate and the character of publications which may enjoy the second-class mail privilege, this provision is in the law:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes or for free circulation or for circulation at nominal rates.

Now, answering specifically the gentleman's inquiry, it is under that statute that all regulations relative to the privilege of the second-class rate are issued, and the reason, good or bad or indifferent, which the Third Assistant Postmaster-General has promulgated upon the particular point to which the gentleman has made the inquiry, is that in determining what is a legitimate publication, what is a publication that is not primarily for advertising purposes, what is a publication that is issued for free circulation or at nominal rates, a number of inquiries must be made upon which to base his opinion. Now, I dislike very much to make an answer so short, because it is only incomplete.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Another question, Mr. Chairman. Where did the Post-Office Department get its authority to say that sample copies only to the extent of 10 per cent shall be sent out at pound rates?

Mr. OVERSTREET. In one of the cases that was tried, wherein the Postmaster-General was enjoined by some publisher some years ago from carrying out a regulation which sought to limit the number of sample copies, the court held that that was a matter of regulation, and in that opinion stated that the regulation then promulgated was reasonable. Then, afterwards, a lesser number of sample copies was permitted by the Department; so that, to answer specificially the question of the gentleman, without elaborating, the authority rests in the Posmaster-General under the law prescribing limitations for the admission of publications to the second-class rate, and on that law the Supreme Court made the decisions which were all on that authority.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question, Mr. Chairman. Is there any probability of the House Post-Office Committee recommending favorably what has come to be known as the "Penrose bill," and which is about to harass all of us into apoplexy, and which is pending in the Senate?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am glad that the gentleman from Missouri has asked that question, because it gives me an opportunity to enlighten a large number of gentlemen who apparently have been greatly frightened by what was really a very small matter. The bill, as I take it, provides by way of amendment to change existing law, and under the terms of this amendment no publication should be admitted to the mails which had once been declared to be nonmailable. That statute refers to the statute to prohibit the sending of obscene matter through the mail; and the amendment was introduced, I am informed, by Senator PENROSE of Pennsylvania during three, and possibly four, different Congresses. At neither one of these Congresses was the measure ever considered. At the present Congress the bill was considered, and, as I am informed, was adversely reported.

Mr. MANN. And is lying on the table there now.

Mr. OVERSTREET. By order of the committee. Therefore, to answer the question of my friend, I think I can safely say that there will be no report from our committee this session.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to say just a few words on these subjects I have raised. The Penrose bill may be a very small thing to harass people into apoplexy, but the number of letters which come here, incited by the Penrose bill, is large enough to give people a great deal of trouble. The Post-Office Department has ample law now to settle this whole business of legitimate and illegitimate publications. All that it needs is nerve and common sense. These advertising publications which they are striking at and which are now transported as newspapers at newspaper rates can all be shut out of the mails by the exercise of ordinary discretion. That is what this restriction against a large number of sample copies was intended to accomplish. The trouble with the Post-Office Department about it is that it will not draw the line between a publication that is evidently simply an advertising scheme and a legitimate newspaper. The Congress itself should take the matter in hand and differentiate betwixt the two on some reasonable basis of percentages of reading matter and advertisements in any given publication. That seems to me to be the only fair way of settling it.

It never was the legitimate newspaper of this country that abused the privilege of sample copies. The Congress never intended to strike at the sample copies issued by legitimate newspapers. The thing that the Congress was trying to regulate and to prevent was the so-called "magazines" or "newspapers" carrying almost a limitless number of bogus subscribers, with the minimum of reading matter and the maximum of advertisements. I understand that one of them used to take a contract to furnish a million subscribers if any one wanted them and would pay the price. They based their advertisements on that so-called "circulation." Ten per cent is not enough to allow for sample copies for legitimate newspapers at the pound rate. They ought to have the privilege of sending out more. There is not a man from a rural constituency that does not know that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Do you not understand that it is an accumulative privilege?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand it is cumulative.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think myself that the country papers and many more ought to enjoy the privilege of sample copies; but they do not care to send out 100 per cent every issue. Where they have the cumulative privilege they would have the privilege of sending out 100 per cent once each year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that Congress itself is derelict about this business. As I said during the very interesting speech of my friend from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], this subject has been up in two Congresses since I have been here in the two so-called "Loud bills." Mr. Loud is a man of fine capacity, of perfect integrity, and of high courage, but his temper was not exactly angelic. The first time he had his bill up he made me mad about the way in which he treated one of my Missouri friends, and I promised him to kill his bill. I had some hand on the floor in killing it. At the time it came up in the next Congress I changed my mind about the bill, so I went to him and told him that if he would put in four amendments I would support it. He put them in. One of them was that publishers should have the privilege of sending out 100 per cent of sample copies.

But it turned out that we had so thoroughly set the mind of the House in the first battle we had here that we could not change it then, and Congress never did change it.

I want to say a word or two as to the ruling of the Post-Office Department, about subscriptions in advance. I am rather inclined to the opinion that in the course of time it would bring all of the newspaper business of the country around to a cash basis, which would be desirable; the cash basis is desirable in all transactions where it is possible; but while they were getting around to a cash basis as to subscriptions, especially if you are going to fix it on the first of next April, there are a good many of these small publications over the country which will go under. They will not survive until the time when the cash system will be established among these newspapers.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Especially during a panic.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; especially during a panic. Representatives who live in agricultural districts understand the habits of agricultural people. Take it out in Kansas or Missouri, or any of these rich agricultural States; one of these country newspapers will sometimes carry a farmer worth ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand dollars six or eight or ten years. He knows he is good pay and the editor knows it also. Hence there is no hurry. I was a newspaper man myself once, and raised the subscription price of the paper from a dollar to a dollar and a half, and invited my subscribers to come in and pay up. I had bought another man out. And I was surprised to find that there were men in that county worth twenty or thirty thousand dollars who had let their subscriptions run five, six, eight, and ten years. You can not change the habits of people instantly, and publishers ought to have more time than until the 1st of April to try the experiment. I had a letter from a man running a newspaper in my district—one of the richest agricultural counties under the sun—and he said if that order was enforced rigidly by the 1st of April his paper would have to suspend.

The time of Mr. CLARK of Missouri having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I received a letter from a very intelligent man, the author of four or five books, who has an interest in a newspaper in a growing town of about seven or eight thousand people, in a rich agricultural region, and he said it was reducing their subscribers so fast that by the 1st of April there would be a third of them gone, and he gave this reason for it: It is a prairie county, where they have no rocks or gravel roads, and can not have them, because there is nothing out of which to make them, and at this time of the year, last month and this month, until the first of next month, the roads are the worst of the entire year. With a rural mail route carrying the farmers' mails to them and with the roads so bad that the farmers do not come to town, they do not pay for their paper, and if the publishers stop the paper it makes them mad, and they will not subscribe again. He said that the time for experimentation ought to be extended, and I say so, too. I can not see how it is in any way the business of the Post-Office Department to undertake to determine who is and who is not a bona fide subscriber to a legitimate newspaper. Certainly the test of paying in advance is not a fair one. Great metropolitan papers can conduct their subscription business in that way, but the plan works hardships on country publishers. The latter are having a tough job of it anyway to make buckle and tongue meet with the exactions of the paper trust and the severe competition with the cheap weekly and semiweekly editions of the great metropolitan dailies. Surely no sane man in the Post-Office Department or out of it desires to cripple or kill the rural weeklies. Having once been a country editor, l'esprit du corps, if nothing else, would make me take up the cudgels in their behalf.

Having said that, I want to say another thing: The way the Post-Office Department has been run in the last four or five years, it exercises powers which are dangerous and oppressive, to say the least and to put it mildly. By issuing an order the Post-Office Department can ruin the business of any man in this country, and there is no appeal from that order. The Congress ought to pass a law on that subject something like this: That the Post-Office Department, after a hearing, shall have the right to issue a fraud order, and then the injured party shall have a right to appeal to a court and have a judicial decision on it. The ex-parte business has been abused in certain cases; there is no doubt in the world about that. I have no disposition to abuse the Post-Office Department officials. They have acted, I suppose, from what they conceived to be the best interests of everybody concerned, but it is a dangerous power to lodge in the hands of any Department—that simply by the ruling of a subaltern a man's business shall be completely shut up and he shall have no right of appeal to the courts. The quicker that part of it is remedied the better off the country is going to be.

The reason I asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], about the Penrose bill is that it seems to have set the country wild, and if the Penrose bill were to pass the Department would be really a censor of the public press, and its decisions would be conclusive as to what papers should and should not be circulated through the mails. Certainly no lover of his country and his kind wants to see a press censorship established in this country. I am glad to know that the Penrose bill is dead. It was partly to save myself the trouble of writing some four or five thousand letters, and to save others the trouble of writing innumerable letters, about the Penrose bill that I asked that question and have made these remarks. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill in reference to the item under consideration?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I understand that there has already been installed mechanical conveyers and equipment of some sort in the post-office here. Is it proposed to take those out and put in other apparatus?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not understand that there are any conveyers installed in the local post-office. This item, Mr. Chairman, was inserted in the bill at the urgent request of the Postmaster-General, in order, as he explained, to grant new facilities, or rather additional facilities, for handling the mails in the post-office in the city of Washington. The character of the conveyers, as explained by his representative before the committee, would be to save time and labor of the clerks in the office, and the general character of these conveyers, as we understood, were much the same as those used now in the Chicago office.

The Postmaster-General said further that it was his ambition to show in the city of Washington a well-equipped post-office, with modern appliances, which might be used as a good example for other cities in the use of these appliances. Our first impression was that this character of appropriation ought not to appear in the post-office appropriation bill, but should be carried in the sundry civil or public buildings bill. Upon inquiry we were advised that there has been no appropriation for furnishing devices of a mechanical character in the Washington City post-office since the original furnishing of the office at the time the building was constructed, and in view of that we inserted the item.

Mr. MANN. I should be inclined to think that if the item belonged in any bill it might more properly go in this bill than in any other, because it would be particularly a post-office matter as apart from the building itself.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Still, the entire furnishings of all post-offices and public buildings, as the gentleman knows, are carried under the bill with respect to Treasury expenditures.

Mr. MANN. I had this experience about the Chicago post-office: The Post-Office Department declined to take jurisdiction and the Treasury Department declined to take jurisdiction. Both Departments declined to do anything, and it was only by making a trip from Chicago to Washington and with a good deal of hard talk that I finally got the Post-Office Department to turn over $800 to the Treasury Department and got the Treasury Department to make the plans.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the gentleman know from what fund that was taken?

Mr. MANN. I do not know. I think myself it was turned over without express authority of law, but it was one of those cases where the Department was forced to act or be in the position where it could not handle the mails. I believe the Postmaster-General obtained the opinion from the Attorney-General's Department that he could take it out of some fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was probably taken from the fund for miscellaneous expenses of the first and second class post-offices.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It might be taken out of that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I want to ask the chairman a question relating to the paragraph preceding this, as I was out of the Chamber when it was passed. In connection with the appropriation of $5,000 for services and information looking toward the apprehension of criminals, I have had it suggested that the Department retained regularly upon its rolls, and probably would pay them out of this appropriation, professional criminals and other yeggmen for watching others.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Where did the gentleman get the information?

Mr. HARRISON. I recollect seeing it in the newspapers some time ago.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, the newspaper may have contained what the gentleman says, but it scarcely would come within the category of "information." I may say that some fund has been carried under this character of appropriation for many years. Its purpose is to enable the post-office inspectors, when engaged in ferreting out criminals within their jurisdiction, to make expenditure of money for which they do not give vouchers, for by giving receipts their identity would necessarily be disclosed, and under that appropriation the Postmaster-General would have authority to pass the accounts of post-office inspectors to a limited extent, not exceeding the amount appropriated, to cover that character of expenditure. If there are any criminals on the payroll of the Post-Office Department under that item of appropriation, I do not know it.

The gentleman from New York might have gone further with his newspaper authority, and perhaps would not have been far from newspaper report, and said that a good many criminals are on the pay roll under the post-office appropriation, but they do not appear in the auditor's accounts, and the vouchers are safely found by examination in the Treasury Department.

I appreciate the report to which the gentleman refers. There was some newspaper notoriety about it, but I think the whole thing emanated from pure notoriety.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to say that the chief inspector recently, before a committee of the House, denied under oath that there was any known criminal carried upon the pay rolls of the Department, so far as he knew.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill how much money this bill carries for the rural delivery system.

Mr. OVERSTREET. We will reach that item, I hope, soon. There are two or three different items. I presume the gentleman from Tennessee refers to the carrier item.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to have that, of course, and all the others.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Thirty-five millions three hundred and seventy-three thousand dollars; and then in the item of supplies, $75,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many carriers have we now?

Mr. OVERSTREET. About 38,000, I think; 37,000 or 38,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many routes?

Mr. OVERSTREET. About 200 more routes than carriers.

[Mr. GAINES of Tennessee addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses incident to the investigation and testing of mechanical and labor-saving devices, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, for use in the postal service, $10,000.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of having embodied in the RECORD a letter bearing on the necessity and importance of passing the bill providing for the Thirteenth Census at this session of Congress. I believe that this letter will prove of interest to the Members of the House, and to it I invite their attention. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in that way.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 10, 1908.

Hon. ALBERT S. BURLESON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of February 29, 1908, in which you say:

"Recently, during the pendency before the House of the bill providing for the taking of the Thirteenth Census, it developed that there was a difference of opinion as to the necessity or importance of passing this bill during this session of Congress. I write you with a view of securing more fully an expression from you as to whether or not you deem it of importance that the Congress should act upon this bill now. If so, will you please state in detail the reasons upon which you base your belief and the advantages, if any, in enacting this bill into law at the present session of Congress?"

I am glad of an opportunity to answer your question in detail. The decennial enumeration of the population and resources of the United States is a work of such enormous difficulty and complication that ample time should be given for preparation. The Census Office is required by the pending bill to enumerate within a period of thirty days (in cities within two weeks) not less than 90,000,000 persons through the aid of 330 supervisors and, approximately, 65,000 enumerators. In the same period it must enumerate the products of nearly 7,000,000 farms. The difficulties of this enumeration have been increasing from decade to decade, by reason of the unprecedented increase of the foreign-born population, of whom there will probably be 15,000,000 to be counted in 1910. They speak a dozen different languages, and many of them know no English. This problem has been demonstrated by recent State censuses to be increasingly serious because of the marked racial change in immigration during the present decade.

It is important before all else that this work shall be done accurately. There is but one possible way to avoid the errors of past censuses. That way is to allow all the time that is necessary to thoroughly and efficiently organize the field service. If the census law is enacted at this session of Congress, there will be two full years to devote to this field organization, and it is none too much time. If it is postponed until the short session, this preparatory period will be cut in two and shortened one year. Previous experience has conclusively demonstrated that this is not time enough.

The actual work in taking the census devolves upon the supervisors and enumerators. The former are the field officers; the latter actually secure the returns. It is clear that the accuracy of the census, no matter with what fidelity and perfection the returns are finally tabulated in Washington, depends upon the intelligence, character, and training of supervisors and enumerators. At prior censuses no opportunity has ever existed for a proper training of either of these classes of employees.

The majority of the census supervisors since that office was substituted for the deputy marshal in 1880 entered upon their work with vague and insufficient knowledge of their duties and responsibilities. A considerable proportion never realized these responsibilities at all. Some were totally disqualified for effective service. The Director of the Census never had opportunity to determine the qualifications of candidates for supervisors in advance of their appointment. If the census bill passes at this session, every one of these 330 supervisors can be chosen as the result of a demonstrated capacity to properly and intelligently supervise the enumeration of his district. They can all enter upon duty on or about the first day of the decennial census period, July 1, 1909, permitting nine months, or until April 15, 1910, for their training in every branch and phase of the work. Thus they will comprise the best equipped and qualified body of men ever brought together in this service. Otherwise, the Thirteenth Census supervisors will doubtless average on a par with their predecessors—no worse, probably, and probably no better.

The necessity for securing competent enumerators is equally great, if not greater. The early designation of supervisors is indispensable, if this is to be done. The enumerators are the men who, after all, determine the accuracy and the value of a census. There is no way in which the Census Office can check back their work; there is no time to check it back. It must be accepted as it stands, except in cases of obvious fraud or error.

There will be required, approximately, 65,000 of these enumerators at the Thirteenth Census, located in as many enumeration districts. The pay is small, the duties strenuous, the conditions exacting, the service quickly over. The theory has generally prevailed that any person who happens to be out of a job can do the work as well as any other. In fact, the enumerator should be above the average intelligence; should possess a good education; should know his district thoroughly, and should command the respect of his neighbors. It is the most troublesome problem of census work to get the right men to act as enumerators. It is only possible to get the right men, by allowing ample time to sift and discriminate among the applicants. There must be a practical test of qualification in each individual case, if the best results are to be secured.

It is obvious that the machinery of the Civil Service Commission can not be utilized in their selection. That office would be required to hold not less than 6,000 special examinations, in as many different localities, at practically the same time, and its machinery could not be expanded to meet these conditions, without incurring an enormous expense, not warranted for employment which lasts but thirty days at the most, if the same result can be obtained in any other way. It can be obtained, if sufficient time is given the Census Office. A pass examination, substantially competitive in character, should precede the appointment of every enumerator, and every person desiring to take it should be permitted to do so, and be furnished with the necessary papers. They would consist of a sample schedule, accompanied by the instructions, to be filled out by the applicant. He should also be required to answer certain questions framed to test his comprehension of the significance of the instructions. This was the plan adopted at the Twelfth Census; but it proved a practical failure, except in a comparatively few instances, simply because there was not time enough to carry it out. If Director Merriam had been given sufficient time in which to organize his army of enumerators, in accordance with his plans, he would have secured the finest body of census takers ever known; as it was, the Twelfth Census enumerators were the best force we have ever had in this country, because they represented the first test of qualification ever attempted. If the Thirteenth Census law is passed by Congress at this session, we shall have the time necessary to weed out the enumerators whose test schedules demonstrate their incompetency. Otherwise, we shall find ourselves no better off in this respect than at the Twelfth Census.

I am convinced that if the opportunity to test and select the enumerators is given, the gain in the accuracy of the Thirteenth Census, over all prior censuses, will be greater than can be definitely measured or than will ever be known; but it appeals to me as a conclusive reason why the Congress should not delay legislation, the necessity for which no one questions. If the census is worth taking at all, it is worth taking under the conditions which make for the greatest possible accuracy.

The Thirteenth Census will not cost any more money as the result of census legislation at this session; on the contrary, I am convinced that prompt action will not only greatly increase the general accuracy of the census but will also tend to reduce its cost.

The dates on which previous census laws have been enacted are as follows:

Act providing for the Tenth Census (1880), approved March 3, 1879.

Act providing for the Eleventh Census (1890), approved March 1, 1889.

Act providing for the Twelfth Census (1900), approved March 3, 1899.

It will be noticed that in each instance the census bill did not become a law until the very last days of the short session, which was the last moment that the law could be enacted before the date of taking the census. A similar delay in the Thirteenth Census legislation, even with the advantage of a permanent Census Office, would be almost fatal to the census, because the date of that census has, for carefully considered reasons, been moved forward forty-five days, to April 15, instead of June 1.

All recent censuses have been harum-scarum struggles to get the work started and finished on time; with no opportunity for deliberation; with all the waste, hurry, scramble, strain, and liability to error which come from the necessity of compressing two years' work into one.

In short, opportunity for improvement in the Federal census consists almost entirely in better organization, and organization of whatever character, whether for war or peace, demands time. Without sufficient time it is not possible to make any material improvement in the Thirteenth Census over the Twelfth.

In conclusion, permit me to respectfully call your attention to the fact that the President, in his annual message, made the following reference to the census law:

"Legislation should be enacted at the present session of the Congress for the Thirteenth Census. The establishment of the permanent Census Bureau affords the opportunity for a better census than we have ever had, but in order to realize the full advantage of the permanent organization, ample time must be given for preparation."

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor, in his annual report, also made reference to the subject, as follows:

"Accuracy, economy, and expedition in connection with that great work will be materially promoted if all the time possible be given the Bureau in which to carefully and fully mature the general plan and methods of the work, and I earnestly urge the immediate consideration of the necessary legislation."

Very respectfully, S. N. D. NORTH, Director.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post-offices, 2, at $4,000 each; 32, at $3,000 each; 7, at $2,500 each; 6, at $2,000 each; 12, at $1,900 each; 26, at $1,800 each; 68, at $1,700 each; 105, at $1,600 each; 135, at $1,500 each; 115, at $1,400 each; 255, at $1,300 each; 380, at $1,200 each; 360, at $1,100 each; 300, at $1,000 each; 110, at $900 each; 100, at $800 each; and 60, at $700 each; in all, $2,427,500: Provided, That hereafter a second assistant postmaster may be employed at the city of Chicago post-office at an annual compensation of $2,500.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the proviso and ask particularly the occasion for it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. This is a limitation which the gentleman will find following each of the general appropriations, so as to limit the total amount of the appropriation to the amount stated, and not to the computation which would follow by the multiplication of each item.

Mr. WANGER. Possibly it was not read by the Clerk; but the point of order is to the proviso, that hereafter a second assistant postmaster may be employed in the city of Chicago.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I beg your pardon. That provision is put in the bill, Mr. Chairman, to take care of the situation at Chicago, where the present assistant postmaster, having served with great credit and efficiency for a great many years, is pretty old, almost lost his eyesight, and is greatly handicapped by reason of that infirmity. The provision is made for a second assistant postmaster, to aid the first assistant, who is now in that condition, for the reason that the committee believe that the distinguished services of the assistant postmaster at Chicago and his long and honorable career would justify giving him some assistance rather than separating him from the service.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me I shall have to insist upon the point of order. This is permanent legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Just one moment. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to have reserved the point of order?

Mr. WANGER. I reserved it, and now I make it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Undoubtedly it is obnoxious to the rule. I was in hope that the explanation would satisfy anybody.

Mr. WANGER. The situation does appeal to me, but this is permanent legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 11 and 12, strike out "$2,427,500" and insert "$2,500,000."

Mr. OVERSTREET. This is to make a correction in the footing.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Pennsylvania insisted upon his point of order relative to the second assistant postmaster in Chicago. We have no such office in the city of New York, but I think I understand the circumstances, and that the city of Chicago was entitled to that consideration. While I am on that subject, I want to congratulate the committee on having initiated that system; that is, remembering that there are men who grow old in the public service, and, in particular relation to their committee, it affects a very large number in the postal service who ought to have some relief. If the committee and the House could see some of the carriers and clerks in New York who have been thirty-five, forty, and more years in the service, they would know that no postmaster that ever lives will discharge or turn them out into the cold. I think the committee in adopting a provision covering this particular case was perfectly correct, and it would be equally so with other cases in the service.

I have introduced a bill that has not received the attention that I should like to have it receive from that committee. I have no doubt it could be improved, and in fact I have introduced another bill that has gone to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, where I hope it will receive a great deal of attention from the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. I ask unanimous consent to insert these bills in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting in the RECORD the matter which he has mentioned. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bills referred to were as follows:

[H. R. 9161, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

In the House of Representatives, December 16, 1907, Mr. BENNET of New York introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed:

A bill to amend the act of June 27, 1884, chapter 126, 23 Statutes at Large, page 60, entitled "An act to grant letter carriers at free-delivery offices fifteen days' leave of absence in each year," relative to certain other leave of absence.

Be it enacted, etc., That all letter carriers at free-delivery offices shall be entitled to leave of absence, not to exceed fifteen days in each year, without loss of pay, and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to employ, when necessary, during the time such leave of absence is granted such number of substitute letter carriers as may be deemed advisable, who shall be paid for services rendered at the rate of $600. The leave of absence of carriers who have been twenty-five or more years in the service may, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be extended for such a length of time as he may in each instance deem advisable.

[H. R. 14942, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

In the House of Representatives, January 23, 1908, Mr. BENNET of New York introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and ordered to be printed:

A bill to grant employees of the United States classified civil service an indefinite leave of absence.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after July 1, 1908, there shall be granted to all employees of the United States of America who have served in the classified civil service for the term of twenty-five years or more, and shall have attained the age of 62 years, a retirement from such service to be known as an indefinite leave of absence.

SEC. 2. That with the commencement of the fiscal year, after the approval of this act, any employee in the classified civil service, who has served continuously for a period of twenty-five years or more, and shall have attained the age of 62 years, may make application to his or her local department chief for such indefinite leave of absence, and said chief, upon approval of same by him, shall refer it to the department head, and upon his approval of same such indefinite leave of absence shall commence from the first day of the following quarter after said approval. It is further provided that any employee of the civil service who shall have attained the age of 62 years, and who shall have served for twenty-five years or more, shall, upon application of the local chief of departmental, and upon approval of departmental head, be granted an indefinite leave of absence, as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 3. That all employees of the classified civil service who may be granted such indefinite leave of absence by this act shall receive during such indefinite leave of absence an annuity of 40 per cent of his or her yearly salary, computed upon the classified salary for the last fiscal year.

SEC. 4. That the balance of such yearly salary shall be applied toward the payment of such substitute or auxiliary taken from the civil service eligible list, who may be assigned to fill the vacancy created by reason of the granting to said employee of an indefinite leave of absence. The assignment of such substitute to have all the effects of original appointment and to be governed by the civil service laws and regulations pertinent thereto.

SEC. 5. That in departments where no substitute or auxiliary service exists the civil service eligible list shall be drawn upon to meet all requirements embodied in this act, and such substitute or auxiliary shall have all the force of regular appointment.

SEC. 6. That any employee receiving a salary in excess of $2,000 per annum, and who may be granted an indefinite leave of absence under the provisions of this act, shall receive an annuity of 40 per cent of a salary of $2,000 per annum.

SEC. 7. That indefinite leave of absence shall be granted on condition: That the applicant or employee is retired by reason of disability not due to vicious habits, or by reason of exigencies of the service, but without fault or delinquency on his part, after a service of twenty years, shall receive an annuity of 20 per cent of his or her yearly salary based upon the classified salary for the last fiscal year.

SEC. 8. That an employee who shall have served continuously in the classified service for a period of ten years shall not be dropped for disability until one year from date of absence.

SEC. 9. That continuous service as referred to herein shall be computed from original appointment in classified service; may include service in one or more Departments of the United States classified civil service, and absence from such service for a period of not more than one year shall not affect an employee's continuous service.

SEC. 10. That the departmental head may provide rules and regulations for the enforcement of this act, and recommend such supplementary legislation to increase the efficiency of this act, as he may deem wise and proper.

SEC. 11. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] was wholly within his rights, and may be correct in making a point of order about the second assistant postmaster at Chicago. It is purely a matter of economy, which addresses itself to the House. It is possible that no item of this sort ought to be in a general appropriation bill, although the post-office appropriation bill every year is necessarily filled with provisos, which are subject to points of order, but they are usually not made.

The postmaster in every large city is a political appointee, much to my regret. He comes in and goes out with administrations, and as a rule it is utterly impossible for the postmaster himself, either in Philadelphia, Chicago, New York, or any other large city, to become thoroughly familiar with the routine of the post-office work. The assistant postmaster at Chicago now is quite capable of performing the work of any one man, and I dare say there are very few Members of Congress who would be able to do as much work as Mr. Hubbard, the assistant postmaster. But there is a clerk, not only in the Chicago post-office, but in every large post-office, doing the work which would be done by a second assistant postmaster, with the exception that he can not sign his name to the papers which he prepares. Every document has to pass through two or three hands before it becomes the order of the postmaster, and the real advantage in having a second assistant postmaster in Chicago, and in other places of importance, would be that the routine work which comes to the postmaster from the various postal stations, from the substations, from the carriers' work, and the clerks' work, hundreds of which are passed upon in a single day, could be passed upon and the documents signed by the man who has the responsibility. While the Chicago post-office is not the largest in the country, it covers a great deal more territory than the post-office of New York City. It has a great many more subpostal stations and a great many more postal stations, and probably has a great many more questions arising from them than even the post-office in the city of New York, though I have not the slightest doubt that the post-office in New York might well have a second assistant postmaster.

We are confronted with this proposition: The State Department at Washington receives less money than the post-office at Chicago. We appropriate for the Secretary of State and three Assistant Secretaries and a great many other officials there, in the interest I suppose of good judgment and economy, but we require a post-office machine in a great city to be run by a political appointee, without proposing to give him the necessary facilities with which to run it. In my judgment, the same thing is true, to a large degree, of the Post-Office Department itself. I am in sympathy with the idea of having some one in the Post-Office Department who will not change with the Administrations, either partisan or at the end of the Presidential term, so that some general idea may be maintained by some one in charge; and the same thing ought to be true of a great machine like the Chicago post-office, which takes in $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 a year and expends large sums of money in handling the local mail and large sums in transferring the mail which goes from the East to the West. Chicago, as you all know, is the transfer station between the East and the West. The mail goes through that city. It is largely handled at the post-office there, and, in my judgment, it would be in the interests of economy, to the interest of the prompt settlement of questions arising there, if the office of second assistant postmaster can be created there. I may say I am very positive that this proposition to create this place was not in the interest of any individual, but solely in the interest of the public service.

Mr. WANGER. My friend takes issue with the statement of the chairman of the committee on that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. The statement of the chairman of the committee did not have reference to the person who would fill this position.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I certainly dislike to be placed in the ungracious attitude of doing a cruel thing, and it seems to me that in respect to the proposition that is no longer before the House I could not fail to make the point of order. The provision of the bill was permanent in its terms and in its effect. If the occasion was as stated by the distinguished chairman of the committee, that the assistant postmaster at Chicago was in need of relief, the provision should have been limited to the life of that official. If the provision was not intended for the special relief of that office at this time by reason of the age or condition of the assistant postmaster, then the provision should relate to the cities of the country generally, at least to the larger cities. In any event, it seems to me that a proposition of that kind ought to be well considered and be either determined on broad general lines, applicable to all offices which came under the same category, or else so limited in terms as only to afford relief to the office of employment of the particular individual to whom the provision is intended to grant relief and to cease upon his decease, and should afford no argument for creating an additional officer now in this and later in that office because it is done in this or in that office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to correct the impression of the gentleman who has just taken his seat as to the reason for incorporating this provision in the bill—that it was for only a temporary condition at Chicago. The committee considered well the advisability of extending this system of second assistant postmasters to all the leading post-offices. We directed the attention of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Hitchcock, to this question, and asked him as to the advisability of having some additional supervisory official over the subordinate officials and employees at these large offices, and he believed that some such office should be provided. There was a difference of opinion as to the designation of the official. He thought it would be better to describe him as "chief clerk." The committee weighed the matter very carefully. We had before us letters from the officials at Chicago, pointing out the urgent need of having an additional administrative officer there to take the place when the assistant postmaster would be occupied with other duties, and to divide his work.

I wish also to direct the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that under the existing law such a second assistant postmaster is provided for in the city of New York. The post-offices at New York and Chicago are in a separate class. The total receipts of the post-office at New York will aggregate $20,000,000. At Chicago they will aggregate sixteen to eighteen million dollars. The next class, with Philadelphia and Boston, the receipts are six or seven million dollars.

There was this particular condition which was peculiar to Chicago. There they have not as many branch post-offices as in some of the other large cities. If the gentleman will study the conditions he will find that in the postal substations there is a certain limit as to the number of clerks and carriers that can emanate from a station to have the service well administered. In Chicago they have an enormous amount of mail center in the local office, and there is urgent need for this position. The position will be in the classified service, and we want, for the benefit of the service, to give the Postmaster-General the right to select a high-grade man, so as to equip that office that the work can be properly carried on. I do not believe, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania knew the facts, he would insist on the point of order, because he is only checking the administration of the great postal service. We are seeking to add but one official to the Chicago office in all these years, when the receipts have increased from $5,000,000 to $18,000,000. I ask the gentleman whether or not he does not believe that it is economy to have an administrative officer to share the duties of the other administrative officers when they are overworked so that they can not properly attend to all their duties? Is it not short-sighted policy to deprive the Chicago office of this high-grade administrative officer and thereby cause much hampering of the service? I hope that this presentation and statement of the condition, together with the fact that the committee gave thorough consideration to the matter and that it was concurred in by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, will lead the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise to express satisfaction that my colleague from the State of Pennsylvania has been on guard and has been as watchful as our distinguished colleague from Illinois usually is. That a question should have arisen between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is extremely interesting of itself; but I join with the others who have spoken, to express the hope, in view of the vast increase of the business of the Chicago post-office, which increase, of course, has been identical with that of New York and Philadelphia, that my colleague from Pennsylvania will, in the interest of the needs of the post-offices of these three cities, withdraw his point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire what the parliamentary status is.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee at present.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I suggest that we proceed with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks and employees at first and second class post-offices:

Superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, and superintendents of registry, eight, at not exceeding $3,200 each.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question as to this paragraph:

For the compensation of clerks and employees at first and second class post-offices.

I desire first to ask if that provides for the payment of clerks, and also whether the bill provides for the payment of carriers, in accordance with the provisions in the act approved March 2, 1907.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the gentleman refer to what is commonly known as the "classification act?"

Mr. GILL. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that for several pages immediately following this paragraph there are various items enumerating the clerks by the designations by which they are actually known in the service. There are so many superintendents of delivery, and so many superintendents of mail, etc. In the service, the classification act to which the gentleman refers undoubtedly controls, and the appropriation for the whole classification of clerks at first and second class post-offices is built up upon the total number of employees of these various grades of salaries, who are in the service on the 1st day of next July, the beginning of the new fiscal year, plus the provision of appropriation for the promotion of all of those employees who will be entitled to promotion under the classification act, and plus the new appointees who may be authorized under this act at the lowest grade of salary as provided under the terms of the classification act.

Mr. GILL. Then this act will not cover the necessary amount to pay for the promotions?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, it does carry it. I will call the gentleman's attention to this. The item to which he directs the attention of the committee is at the bottom of page 5 of the bill. The various items covering the designated positions of the various employees, by their official character at various salaries, follow up until the middle of page 11 of the bill, where it says:

In all, $28,661,500.

Now, that sum is made up of all of this variety of employees as follows: The total annual appropriation or annual expense necessary to pay all of them who are in the service at their respective grades of salaries, plus all the appropriation necessary to provide for the promotion under the classification act, plus all of the new men who will be appointed during the next year at the lowest grade of salary.

Mr. GILL. I just want to ask one further question. Under this provision the classification of the carrier and clerks is into six grades. Now, it is provided further that clerks and carriers at first-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fifth grade and clerks and carriers of the second-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fourth grade. I want to ask whether it is the intention of this act that when the first classification is made there shall be no further promotions to the sixth grade in the one case and to the fourth grade in the second case.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not unless there is appropriation specifically made by Congress.

Mr. GILL. Not unless it is specifically authorized by Congress in an appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will permit me to explain the theory of that classification act, I shall be glad to do so. The classification act first provides different grades—six grades—six, eight, nine, ten, eleven, and twelve hundred grades. Second, it provides for the automatic promotion from each grade to the next higher——

Mr. GILL. Up to the fifth and fourth.

Mr. OVERSTREET. And that automatic promotion depends upon two things—first, one year's service by the clerk in one grade, and second, a proper efficiency record of that clerk during that one year. The automatic character, however, of the classification stops arbitrarily at the thousand-dollar grade.

Mr. GILL. Only clerks at $1,100, does it not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It stops arbitrarily at the $1,000 clerks in the second-class offices and at the $1,100 clerks in the first-class offices. Therefore the classification act, so far as the authority for the promotion is concerned, halts absolutely at $1,100 in the first-class offices. Now, so far as the clerks are concerned, there have been for a great many years clerks of the sixth, or $1,200, grade. They are provided for in this bill. There has never been a grade of the sixth class, or $1,200 grade, of carriers until it was authorized by the classification act. So far as this bill goes we have not recommended an appropriation for the promotion of the carriers from the fifth, or $1,100, grade to the sixth, or $1,200, grade.

Mr. GILL. Then, as I understand the gentleman, this promotion ceases now at the sixth grade in the first-class and at the fifth grade in the second-class post-offices until Congress will authorize through an appropriation bill an appropriation specifically for the money necessary to pay for the promotion?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly——

Mr. GILL. In other words, it stops and will not go on until some further appropriation is made by Congress?

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, will hesitate just long enough for one further little thought, he will see at once that there is absolutely no provision for promotion of any post-office employee except the money is appropriated for it. There is——

Mr. GILL. I understand that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. So that I think the gentleman leaves the wrong impression.

Mr. GILL. They would not get the money if you did not appropriate it, but under the provisions of this act you certainly would appropriate it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly, and we always have.

Mr. GILL. As far as those who have already been promoted, and who perhaps would be entitled to be promoted, up to the fifth and fourth classes in the first and second class post-offices.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The difficulty of the gentleman is that he evidently confuses what is known as the arbitrary law of promotion and the ordinary rate of pay.

Mr. GILL. No; I do not think so.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Promotion stops absolutely under the law at the $1,100 grade.

Mr. GILL. I think I understand the case, and that is that after the first classification there are no further promotions in the first class to the sixth grade, and in the second class to the fifth grade, until some further action is taken by Congress. In other words, there is notice to all the carriers and to all the clerks that they will not receive any further promotion in the first class to the sixth class and in the second class to the fifth class until the committee and this House say that there shall be further promotion.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Why, Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it is necessary to reply to such an inquiry as that, because it does not either state the fact or leave the proper impression with the committee. Suppose the gentleman would apply his argument to the clerks of the $1,400 grade, or the $1,300 grade, or of the $1,200 grade? No provision is made there for arbitrary promotion any more than in the sixth grade or in the fifth. The committee, which is the servant of Congress, has not treated the clerks of the fifth grade any differently than it has treated the clerks of the sixth, seventh, and other grades. The only difference is in the classification which provided arbitrarily for an automatic promotion one year with another of certain grades, and that we provided for.

Mr. MANN. While the gentleman is on this subject, would he wish to discuss it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would prefer not to do so.

Mr. MANN. There is some point involved in the paragraph on page 11. I did not know but that the gentleman would prefer to explain that now.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think it better to take it up at the proper point.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. If the gentleman will permit me, how are these promotions hereafter to be made?

Mr. OVERSTREET. They are made under the law. The law prescribes that the clerk or carrier from one grade to another shall be promoted in accordance with the year of service in the next lower grade and a proper efficiency record. I have not the law before me, but I can turn to it in just a moment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Auditors, two, at not exceeding $3,000 each.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment:

In page 6, line 1, "Auditors, two, at not exceeding $3,000 each," strike out the word "two" and insert the word "five."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 1, after "Auditors," strike out "two" and insert "five."

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer this in order to restore the $70,000 recommended by the Postmaster-General as necessary to promote employees that receive not exceeding $1,200. Now, there are 1,490 employees now directly interested in these promotions. Of this number, 270 are interested in promotion from $1,300 to $1,400, 50 are interested from $1,400 to $1,500, 7 from $1,500 to $1,600, 14 from $1,600 to $1,700, 2 from $1,700 to $1,800, 18 from $2,000 to $2,100, 18 from $2,100 to $2,200, 21 from $2,400 to $2,500, 3 from $2,600 to $2,700, and 3 from $2,900 to $3,000, making an aggregate of 1,496 employees directly interested.

The whole number of post-office employees are 29,371, and they are all interested in these promotions. I understand that the Postmaster-General has made a careful and scrutinizing investigation, and he regards this sum of $70,000 as necessary. It is a mere bagatelle compared with the aggregate appropriations carried in this bill, which are $28,061,500. These promotions in the Post-Office Department are automatic. There is no branch of the public service so near to the people, and there are no employees in the public service that render so much service for so meager hire as the employees of the Post-Office Department. I believe that this amount asked for by the Postmaster-General should be restored. I believe the recommendations of the Postmaster-General are wise and for the best interests of the public service. Of course I do not desire to criticise the Post-Office Committee. They have acted in a commendable way in reducing expenditures, but this House, when the military appropriation bill was under consideration, increased the pay of the Army in the aggregate $4,000,000. Now, it does not look right to me to increase the pay of the idle men of the Army and deny the real workers the paltry sum of $70,000. The Army to-day is an idle army. There is no use for the Army to-day, practically, and we all hope, every gentleman on both sides of this House, that we will have no use for it in the future. I do not want myself to go to the country on the statement that we have increased the pay of the Army $4,000,000 and denied to the employees of the Post-Office Department the meager sum of $70,000. This is saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung. I will say to the chairman of the committee that if he consents to this amendment I will not offer any more.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I certainly can not approve of that amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. The point at which the gentleman proposes his amendment is the auditors at the rate of $3,000. There are two in the service, and they are employed at the offices of New York and Chicago, the two great offices where auditors of this class are most needed. The comment of the gentleman that we need more provisions for promotion I think is a little weak, when we come to understand just what promotion the bill as it comes before the committee carries. It is the intention of the committee when they reach the proper point in the bill to offer to increase the $2,000 item, and add ten additional employees. The reason that is provided for in the superintendents of stations in the larger cities is that the additional stations will very probably be necessary before the close of the next fiscal year.

We have, however, Mr. Chairman, made provision which will result in the promotion of over 20,000 clerks—19,845—and when we add the 10 to the superintendents of stations to the grade of $2,000 it will make approximately 100 more. Therefore, when the gentleman says that no provision has been made for promotions of these clerks he certainly is not figuring according to the best methods known to the service for that character of compensation. The committee, Mr. Chairman, is not guilty of cheeseparing. It is not narrow-minded when it comes to the preparation of these great postal-supply bills. The committee has sought to be liberal in its recommendations. Under the existing law we have in every instance given the service the benefit of the doubt where additional force might possibly be needed. We have provided amply and adequately for the promotion under the automatic scale of the classification act. While we have recommended partial promotion for clerks and for employees in the service this year, I think gentlemen will appreciate that there are good and sufficient reasons why a wholesale provision of promotion should not be made.

At the last session of Congress we appropriated approximately $12,000,000, which was used solely for the purpose of the increase of the salaries of employees. We have felt, therefore, that this year—the very next succeeding session of the House following that liberal recommendation—we can well afford to halt and not make further provision solely based upon demands for increases of salary. I venture to say there is not a business concern in the country to-day, nor an enterprise of any magnitude, which, since the 1st of January, has voluntarily or involuntarily increased the salaries of its employees. Shall the Government be different from the ordinary individual in the transaction of its business? Shall it prosecute its business upon a more lax and liberal plan than private enterprise? It will not do to hurl at the committee the anathemas of gentlemen whose constituents, employees in the service, demand these increases, because we all have those constituents. I venture to say that in the district which I have the honor to represent there are a larger number of postal employees by far than in the average Congressional district of the country.

If I were to follow my own private desires to gratify my friends at home, and possibly stimulate their political activity in the coming campaign, then I might be guilty of forgetting my duty to the Government and the necessity of comparing existing conditions with former conditions, taking credit, if you please, for the liberal appropriation of the last session, and merely making provision adequate and ample for the service, without recommending general increases of salaries. I know these recommendations have been made by the Postmaster-General, but it does not necessarily follow that we should forget the need for careful estimates and careful computation. I think therefore that right at the outset of this bill it ought to be understood by this committee whether we are going to be guided in the conduct of the preparation of this supply bill by the necessities of the service, by fair methods of appropriation, by the conservative business principles which should prompt our action, or whether we are going simply to provide for wholesale increases of salaries for the mere purpose of gratifying individuals who happen to live in our districts. We have a bill here which carries in excess of $220,000,000. We have provided for every proper increase of service made necessary by the growth of the business. We have answered every demand of the statute, carried by the classification act. We have provided for the increases of the different items which make up the great postal service; but we say to the House and to this committee that we do not believe it wise, in the first session after we have made liberal appropriation for increased salaries, that we should follow that by an additional increase based wholly and solely upon promotions. I hope the amendment will be disagreed to. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, and superintendents of registry, eight, at not exceeding $3,200 each.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask how the number of these superintendents of delivery and superintendents of mail and of stations, etc., is determined, whether arbitrarily or by the business of the different offices.

Mr. OVERSTREET. By the actual employment, as they are now employed. There is no change in the number of employees thus far in the bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will they not graduate up in increases of salary as the business of the offices increases?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There are certain employees who do graduate up. I mean the superintendents of mail, the superintendents of money orders, of registry, etc., are graduated upon the salaries of the postmasters.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Some of these are superintendents of mail, and they are mixed up with superintendents of delivery.

Mr. OVERSTREET. These paragraphs are framed according to the actual conditions existing at the time the bill was drawn, the number of men employed in each division.

Mr. DRISCOLL. But as the business of the post-offices increases, will they not graduate up and get larger pay under the law?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman will remember that the law fixes a maximum. It is not mandatory that they shall have the maximum, but in almost all of them the maximum is reached, so that the appropriation is based upon the theory that they will be paid the maximum, or very nearly the maximum, which the law provides.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I was particular about that, because I know an instance where a man is not getting the maximum under the law on the amount of business done in the office, and I wanted to know whether the law required that, according as the office graded up in its receipts, the superintendent of mails was entitled to get 45 per cent.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The law is not mandatory. The law fixes the maximum to which the various employees of that class may be promoted, and, of course, if the office, by reason of increase of the volume of business, would justify a higher allowance than they could get, and the amount was not sufficient, they would stand over until the next appropriation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, bookkeepers, cashiers, examiners of stations, finance clerks, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, superintendents of inquiry, and superintendents of stations, eighty-five, at not exceeding $2,000 each.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 13, strike out the word "eighty-five" and insert the word "ninety-five."

Mr. WANGER. I desire to reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I was going to explain this amendment, and I did mention it briefly a moment ago. There are at present eighty-five individuals filling these various positions provided for in this paragraph. It is felt, however, that there is a strong probability that in some cities, particularly the larger cities, there would be need of additional superintendence of stations. This arises frequently by the discontinuance of smaller post-offices adjacent to and merging into the larger office, and the creation of a station for which the station agent would be appointed. The fact is in some large cities they need, and will need from time to time, an increased number of larger stations. This is at the grade of the two-thousand class of compensation, and the additional ten that this amendment would provide, raising the number from eighty-five to ninety-five, would be for the purpose of paying that class of employees.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, chief stamp clerks, clerks, finance clerks, foremen of crews, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 2,954, at not exceeding $1,200 each.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, by striking out, on page 10, line 15, after the word "station," the words "two thousand nine hundred and fifty-four" and insert "five thousand six hundred and thirty-seven."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 15, after the word "station," strike out the words "two thousand nine hundred and fifty-four" and insert the words "five thousand six hundred and thirty-seven."

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to raise all clerks in first and second class post-offices out of the eleven-hundred-dollar and into the twelve-hundred-dollar grade. I shall follow that up, Mr. Chairman, with another amendment so as to include letter carriers. The purpose of this amendment, as it will be seen, is to give $1,200 to clerks who are now receiving $1,100, and thereby placing them in the highest grade which Congress at its last session created. The appropriation that was made last year permitted simply those who were receiving $1,000 to receive $1,100. Congress failed to make an appropriation for the $1,200 grade.

Mr. Chairman, I hope it may not be said of me that this amendment is offered for the purpose of stimulating political activity in my district.

As a member of the Post-Office Committee I contended last year that Congress ought to increase all salaries of post-office employees, except postmasters, at least 20 per cent. After some effort the eleven and twelve hundred grades were finally created. The reasons that existed then for establishing these two grades exist to-day, and it must therefore follow that the reasons for an appropriation are equally good. It was urged then that the kind of service that these clerks and letter carriers were rendering justified an increase, as well as the increased cost of living warranted such an increase. But it was also thought best not to make the increase of $200 in one year, and advisable that no appropriation should then be made for the $1,200 grade. To that, of course, no objection was made, since it was the purpose, at least as I believed, that the next year—to wit, this year—we might raise the appropriation so as to cover the $1,200 grade. But the Post-Office Committee declined to recommend such appropriation.

It is urged now by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], that the conditions of the country at this time, and taking also into consideration the receipts of the Post-Office Department, would not warrant this increase. I submit whether salaries of post-office employees ought to depend upon income or the condition of the country. If salaries are to be graded according to receipts, then it must follow that if there is an increase in receipts the salaries must be increased, and if there is a decrease they must go down, and we would be annually adjusting and readjusting salaries. It would leave out of consideration the value of the services and the circumstances and conditions relating to living expenses and every other contingency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOEBEL. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOEBEL. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we ought to be consistent. We established a twelve-hundred-dollar grade las year. What was the purpose? Was it simply to have it appear that we were charitably inclined in that direction for the time being and then refuse to make the appropriation? Is it fair? Why do you continue the grade? Why not discontinue it. It is simply a delusion unless you make an appropriation. We thought last year that those services were reasonably worth $1,200. Have we changed our minds? Are they worth less to-day? Has any reason been urged here why we should not make this appropriation other than the reasons the distinguished chairman of the committee has given, namely, that the receipts of the Post-Office Department at this time do not justify it, or that the conditions of the country do not justify it? But I submit that those are not valid reasons. I say this in all seriousness. I still maintain, as I did last year, that there ought to be an increase of 20 per cent, and I hope that the committee will take that view by adopting this amendment, which will give to these men what they are fairly entitled to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] has been consistent in demanding his 20 per cent increase this year, but he has gotten considerably away from the reservation of facts. We did not appropriate last year enough money to increase all of the clerks of the eleven-hundred-dollar grade. Neither did we create last year the twelve-hundred grade of clerks. We have had the twelve-hundred grade for several years, and there were clerks employed in that grade; and there were clerks employed in that grade that were not promoted last year, because we did not authorize it. Therefore the House is not going to commit such a dreadful blunder if it stands by the recommendation of the committee, notwithstanding my colleague's very ingenious argument. What are the facts? The facts are still just as much a factor this year as last year, and will be hereafter. In the passage of the classification act providing for the automatic promotion from one grade to another under certain limitations, the sixth grade was put in as $1,200. It existed at the time, and had existed for years, and the arbitrary promotion ceased at the $1,100 grade, as I explained a while ago.

But when Congress made the appropriation last year under the classification act, it appropriated sufficient to promote 50 per cent of the $1,100 grade to $1,200. Therefore the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] now under consideration does more than he says we did last year, and all he asks us to do is to be consistent and to do only what we did last year. This year the item for the $1,200 grade carries 15 per cent increase over the current law. That is to say, 15 per cent of the total number in the $1,100 grade will be arbitrarily promoted to the $1,200 grade. Of course, when I say arbitrarily I mean as distinct from promotions that occur by reason of resignation, deaths, or other ordinary causes in the upper grades.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Does the gentleman mean automatically?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; I do not, because the automatic part stops at the eleven hundred grade. Gentlemen seem to continue to permit their minds to be confused with what is known as the "grade of classification" and what is known as "automatic promotion" under that classification. The grade is a $1,200 grade, as a maximum grade of classification, and the automatic promotion stops with the $1,100 grade. What the gentleman's amendment proposes to do is to provide for the promotion of every man in the $1,100 grade to the $1,200 grade.

Mr. GOEBEL. That would otherwise have come if the gentleman had made the appropriation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But he keeps trying to leave the impression that the committee is violating the classification act.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it optional with the postmaster now whether he promotes from the $1,100 to the $1,200 grade?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is not optional.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the requirement?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The requirement is the amount of money in the $1,200 item.

Mr. MADDEN. Assuming there is a sufficient amount of money, then who has control of the promotion?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The control would be under the Department, of course, on the recommendation of the postmaster. I do not want to leave the impression that the recommendation of the postmaster is final.

Mr. MADDEN. What are the conditions under which the postmaster makes a recommendation?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The efficiency record and term of service.

Mr. MADDEN. That seems about the only condition required.

Mr. OVERSTREET. When the First Assistant Postmaster-General was before the committee two years ago, we inquired of him what was being done relative to the preparation of a uniform standard of efficiency. He stated that he was at work upon it. Another year passed, and he again announced that he was at work upon it.

Mr. MADDEN. Is he still at work upon it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not know.

Mr. MADDEN. Has he made any progress with the work?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. He is doing something else now with great perseverance, is he not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The point is, Mr. Chairman, that there is no uniform standard or grade of efficiency, and in the absence of it the practice is to be very largely guided by the method pursued in the local post-office that makes the recommendation.

Mr. MADDEN. So that if the superintendent in a local office should have any grudge against a man under him he could give him a record that might not entitle him to promotion, whereas if his report was all right, and such a condition did not exist, he would be promoted?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that the First Assistant Postmaster-General explained to the committee that there were a number of complaints made of that character, and each one of those complaints was inquired into. That if a clerk had been unfairly treated—if his efficiency grade had been underestimated by the postmaster and notice was obtained of the same by the Department—it was invariably investigated.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the investigation unearth any injustice to any of the men who might otherwise be entitled to promotion?

Mr. OVERSTREET. My recollection is that the statement was made that it did not reveal any.

Mr. MADDEN. The investigation would be largely an inquiry from those who were responsible for the discrimination, would it not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think it went further than that. Of course the persons primarily responsible for the recommendation would be given an opportunity to be heard. But it was not limited to them.

Mr. MADDEN. What opportunity was given to other people?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not recall. I only remember that the First Assistant Postmaster-General said they were investigating, and I confess I know of no instance which came to the committee where there had been any abuse made of it at all.

Mr. MADDEN. At all events, there are no promotions from the eleven-hundred-dollar to the twelve-hundred-dollar grade now except upon the recommendation of the local postmaster and his assistants?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is true; and the limited appropriation. I started to say, Mr. Chairman, that we do provide for a limited number of the $1,100 grade promotions in order to take care of the appointments which may become necessary in the smaller stations in the post-offices to which clerks are usually appointed at the rate of $1,200 a year.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] would carry an increase of every one in the $1,100 grade to the $1,200 grade?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is my understanding.

Mr. GOEBEL. There will be 3,215 clerks in the $1,100 grade promoted to the $1,200 grade.

Mr. MANN. That relates only to clerks.

Mr. GOEBEL. That is all.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Under the current law there are only 3,108 authorized in the $1,100 grade, so that my statement was correct.

Mr. MANN. I was not finding fault with the statement. What I wanted to get was this information from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL]: Supposing this amendment should prevail, it would not take care of the carrier. It would require another amendment?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes, and I intend to offer that.

Will my friend from a rural district justify to his people an increase of the city carriers and clerks without an increase of the rural carriers? Will he say to his railway mail clerk constituents that he thought that Judge GOEBEL, of Cincinnati, was so gallant in his movement to increase the salaries of the clerks that he was swept off his feet and forgot and did not take care of the rural-delivery carrier and the railway mail clerk? Now, there is only one thing to do. My distinguished friend from Ohio has given one bit of very excellent advice. That is, we are to be consistent. We are consistent when we stand by the policy which has been adopted, namely, to make adequate and ample provision for the service, but not to make increases of salaries. When he says that we ought not to have provided the grade of $1,200 unless we intended to promote the clerks from $1,100 to $1,200, I answer him that that grade of $1,200 is older than his official service in this House. It was not created last year. He is not inconsistent, nor are we.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not quite hear what the gentleman from Indiana said when he was speaking of the salaries of the rural carriers.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I said here was an amendment before the committee providing for an increase of carriers of the $1,100 class in the first-class offices, and the gentleman who offered the amendment held out the promise that if that were carried he would made a motion to increase the salaries of the city carriers; and I made reference to that and said, "How are we going to justify ourselves to the rural carriers in making no increase to them?"

Mr. MANN. That proposition is subject to a point of order, increasing the rural carriers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOEBEL. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, we might as well have it out now, as the chairman of the Post-Office Committee put it; let the committee determine now whether it will make any increases in salaries. I want to say to you that I shall offer an amendment increasing the salaries of letter carriers. I am also going to offer an amendment to compensate the railway mail clerks for their actual expenses while in performance of their duties.

Mr. BUTLER. Are you also going to offer to increase the salaries of the rural carriers, too?

Mr. GOEBEL. No.

Mr. BUTLER. Why discriminate against them?

Mr. GOEBEL. I am going to leave that to you.

Mr. BUTLER. You will be ringing the big bell on that, and there will be several others.

Mr. OVERSTREET. You know it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. GOEBEL. The gentleman from Indiana anticipated me somewhat. His purpose in telling what I was going to do was to impress the Members of the enormous amount involved in the amendments. I do not want to mislead this committee. I am going to offer them because I believe they are right and ought to be adopted, and I am simply carrying out the view I have always entertained with reference to these matters.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana apprehends that there may be a demand to increase the salaries of rural carriers. Congress has nurtured the rural-delivery system from a mere infant in 1896, when it started, at a salary of $150 at first, and in a little while raised it to $300, and at about $100 a year, or about that amount, with the exception of a few years or sessions, until the maximum salary was fixed at $900 by the appropriation bill which was approved March 2, 1907, carrying appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908.

The rural-delivery system, we all remember, was "experimental" for a number of years. Congress did not know whether it would prove a success in this country or not. Congress was uninformed as to what it would cost. Postmaster-General Wilson thought that he could get carriers—boys in their teens and along in that class—for about $300 a year. He did not know then, and Congress has had to work in the dark, feel its way along from year to year, and increase the salary and elaborate the system from time to time, in an honest effort to get at the just compensation and a proper and necessary system for the benefit of the largest number of people possible for the outlay. The appropriation act approved June 13, 1898, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, contained words found, I believe, in all the acts down to and including the year 1902, showing that the system was "experimental" up to that time.

The act of June 13, 1898, provided that—

For experimental free rural delivery, including pay for carriers, horse-hire allowance, supplies, and mechanical appliances, $150,000.

The act of March 1, 1899, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, provided—

For experimental free rural delivery, including pay of carriers, horse-hire allowances, supplies, and mechanical appliances, $300,000.

The next act, of June 2, 1900, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, had the same words, with a larger appropriation, as follows:

For experimental rural free delivery, including pay of carrier, horse-hire allowance, supplies, and mechanical appliances, $1,750,000.

The next year, rather the next act, was approved March 3, 1901, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and contained practically the same words, with more money than the last act. It provided—

For experimental rural free delivery, including pay for carriers, horse-hire allowance, supplies, and mechanical appliances, $3,500,000.

At this time there was a very strenuous effort made to switch off this rural free-delivery system into the "contract system," let it, after advertising, to the lowest bidder, or something like that, claiming that a better and cheaper service could be had. But we defeated that, and thus pushed the rural system along.

A few months previous to this the Department prohibited the carriers from carrying any express packages, and Congress in the next act, approved April 21, 1902, appropriated—

For pay of letter carriers of rural free-delivery service, $7,000,000. In all, for rural free-delivery service, $7,529,400: Provided, That on and after July 1, 1902, the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, authorized to classify the rural free-delivery service and fix the compensation to employees in such service, etc.

And further provided that—

Carriers at salary not exceeding $600 per annum, and no other or further allowance or salary shall be made to said carrier. But the carriers shall not be prohibited from doing an express-package business, provided it does not interfere with the discharge of their official duties.

About this time there was a strong effort made to substitute the "contract system," a sort of "star-route service," for this rural delivery system. But we defeated that. I stood against it and sought cautiously, but surely, as a great majority of Congress did, to raise up this infant, build up this "experimental" rural-route system into a fixed system, to extend throughout the country, as rapidly as we could. And I am glad we did. It has been a blessing to the country people.

It was suggested in the debate by the present Speaker, Mr. CANNON, and possibly by others who were disposed to favor the contract system, that this express privilege would amount to about $400 a year, and that with this privilege given back to the carrier and a $600 salary a proper compensation would be given a carrier and a good service had. Hence Congress did so. It was proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to give the carrier $1,000 salary, but the then friends of the rural system, fighting as they were against the contract system and facing the opposition that was coming from the cities, felt that to fix a salary at this rate, $1,000, at this critical time would break down the rural system and give us the star-route or this contract system, which we were trying to avoid. Hence the $1,000 proposition failed, and the salary of $600 was agreed upon, with the express-package privilege annexed and given back to the carrier. I am glad we did defeat this star-route or contract system and saved and have built up this rural system.

The next act, approved March 3, 1903, for the fiscal year 1904, provided as follows:

In all, for a rural free-delivery service, $12,621,700.

The next act, for the fiscal year 1905, approved April 28, 1904, provided—

For pay of letter carriers and clerks in charge of substations of rural free-delivery service, $20,180,000: Provided, That not exceeding $12,500 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for compensation of clerks in charge of substations.

On and after July 1, 1904, letter carriers of the rural free-delivery service shall receive a salary not exceeding $720 per annum, and no other or further allowance or salary shall be made said carriers; and on and after said date said carriers shall not solicit business or receive orders of any kind for any person, firm, or corporation, and shall not, during their hours of employment, carry any merchandise for hire: Provided, That said carrier may carry merchandise for hire for and upon request of patrons residing upon their respective routes, whenever the same shall not interfere with the proper discharge of their official duties, and under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe.

The next act, approved March 3, 1905, for the fiscal year 1906, "for the rural free-delivery service, $25,828,300," which set on foot this great system and firmly fixed it in our postal laws for all time to come.

The next act, approved June 19, 1906, for the fiscal year 1907, provided:

For pay of letter carriers and clerks in charge of substations of rural-delivery service, $28,000,000. Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for compensation of clerks in charge of substations: Provided further, That rural letter carriers, after twelve months' service, be allowed annual leave, with pay, not to exceed fifteen days; the substitutes for carriers on vacations to be paid during said service at the rate of $600 per annum.

The last act, approved March 2, 1907, provided:

For pay of letter carriers, substitutes for carriers on annual leave, and clerks in charge of substations of rural-delivery service, tolls, and ferriage, $24,900,000. That on and after July 1, 1907, letter carriers of the rural-delivery service shall receive a salary not exceeding $900 per annum: Provided, That rural letter carriers, after twelve months' service, shall be allowed annual leave, with pay, not to exceed fifteen days; the substitute for carriers on vacation to be paid during said service at the rate paid the carrier.

At a glance it is seen how rapidly this system has grown and how responsive Congress has been in strengthening, spreading, dignifying, and popularizing the service; and the people have indorsed it without a murmur. But I do insist that we can, without any detriment to the public service, expand this package provision of the law so as to let the carrier, within certain proper limitations, carry packages backward and forward not only to patrons, but to nonpatrons, say, in a given territory, and in this way improve the service and increase the usefulness of this convenience, as well as the income of the carriers. This provision—that is, confining this package service to patrons only—was itself an "experiment," and now we see where we can improve on the experiment without any harm to anyone, and I think we should do it. We see how it works, we know more about it, and the whole service, as to that, than we have at any time heretofore; and I think we should, as we have done, as we gather wisdom, utilize it to the upbuilding of this system and for the benefit of the people and the public service, and I have called this matter to the attention of the House and to the industrious and intelligent committee which controls our postal legislation, that it may give consideration at an early day to this package proposition when it takes up the salary proposition.

For my part, I am for more pay for the rural carriers if the present pay is not just and reasonable. Of course it is practically useless to offer an amendment at this time. It would be subject to a point of order and be defeated and possibly hurt the proposition. I have not carefully considered this package proposition. I have not had the time; but anyone can see with a little study that this proposition, as it now reads in the law, is too limited. I have talked to a number of Members on this subject, and they all agree with me that this language, "patrons residing on their respective routes," is unnecessarily narrow and unnecessarily restricts and cuts down the chances and possible income of the carrier to the detriment of the people and the carrier, too. I personally know that, because of the narrow operation of this provision, I have had to hire a horse and buggy and pay a boy to go 10 miles into the country to take a small package of medicine, or something of that kind.

Whereas, if you would allow this law to be more liberal than it is, I could give the carrier half a dollar and he would be glad to take it. He would put the half dollar in his pocket and I would keep the four dollars and a half in mine, which I paid for the hire of the horse and buggy. There is the milk in the cocoanut. You can very easily help the rural carrier along, and you can very easily help the country people along, and you can build up this magnificent system and make it what it should be, and comfort the people and help the rural carrier, by eliminating that narrow, and I want to say unintentionally narrow, proposition. I desire to insert here a couple of letters which bear on this question of rural salary and the cost of maintenance. I ask unanimous consent to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the documents which he has indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters are as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, February 24, 1908.

Hon. JNO. WESLEY GAINES, House of Representatives.

SIR: In response to your telephonic request of this date to be advised of the various changes in the compensation paid to rural letter carriers since the institution of the rural delivery service, I beg leave to state that the pay of rural carriers when the service was first started, October, 1896, was placed at $150 and afterwards at $300 per annum. In 1898 it was raised to $400 per annum. On July 1, 1900, it was further increased to $500 per annum. Previous to March, 1902, the Congress took no action toward fixing the salary or compensation of rural carriers, leaving the matter entirely to the Department. In March, 1902, anticipating action by the Congress, the maximum salary was increased to $600 per annum.

In the act making appropriation for the postal service for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1902, the Postmaster-General was authorized to fix the salaries of rural letters carriers at not exceeding $600 per annum.

Up to this time the limit in the length of a route was 25 miles, and 20 miles was regarded as the standard route. With a view to securing greater uniformity in adjusting the compensation of carriers the following schedule was adopted:

	Per annum.
Routes not less than 20 miles	$600
Under 20 and not less than 16 miles	500
Under 16 and not less than 12 miles	400
Under 12 and not less than 8 miles	300
Under 8 and not less than 4 miles	200

In addition to the carrying of the mails, rural carriers were permitted to augment their income by carrying express matter for hire outside of the mails.

At this time the service was growing very rapidly, the extent of area covered increased, and the conditions under which the service was operated grew more varied. It was found practicable in the western prairie States to establish routes of greater length than 25 miles, and in the hilly or mountainous sections it was found practicable to operate routes of greater length than 20 miles, or about an average of 23 miles, and the work and wear and tear involved in serving routes in the western prairie States of 26, 28, and even 30 miles was no greater than on routes of 24 miles in hilly or mountainous sections.

Effective July 1, 1904, the Congress increased the maximum compensation allowed to rural carriers to $720 per annum. This provision carried with it a discontinuance of the privilege of acting as agents for newspapers and restricted the express-carrying privilege, so that now they may carry unmailable matter for hire for and upon the request of patrons only.

With the rapid development of the service referred to, the question arose as to the most equitable basis of readjusting the salaries of carriers. After careful consideration it was determined that to fix the compensation of carriers on the basis of the length of their routes as shown by the records of the Department, while not absolutely equitable, would be the most satisfactory, as it was found to be impracticable to take into consideration the various conditions under which the service is operated, because of the wide difference existing in the several States of the Union, and, indeed, in different sections of the same State.

As already stated, the standard route had been regarded as 20 miles. There was much complaint from carriers serving routes from 25 to 30 miles in length because they were given no greater compensation than those carriers whose routes were but 20 or 25 miles in length. These conditions and the increase in the maximum salary made necessary a readjustment of the basis of fixing compensation and, inasmuch as it was found that about one-half of the routes in operation June 30, 1904, were 24 miles in length, and as the average length of routes had increased to nearly that figure, it was thought equitable that the standard route be fixed at 24 instead of 20 miles, and that the maximum salary be paid to carriers on routes of that length or more. Accordingly the following schedule was adopted:

	Per annum.
8 to 10 miles	$432
16 to 18 miles	576
18 to 20 miles	612
20 to 21 miles	648
21 to 22 miles	666
22 to 23 miles	684
24 miles and over	720

About eighteen months ago, finding that a moderate estimate of the original average cost of horses and vehicles to be about $275, and the average annual cost of maintaining an outfit about $250, and, therefore, the average annual cost of the carrier's outfit to be not less than $300 to $340, and, further, that the cost of living had increased, so that the compensation then paid was regarded as inadequate, it was recommended to the Congress that the maximum salary to be allowed rural carriers be increased to $900 per annum.

This recommendation was adopted in the act making appropriation for the postal service, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1907. With the increase in the maximum compensation from $720 to $900 per annum a further readjustment was necessary.

After giving the matter very careful consideration, and with a view of conforming to the evident intent of Congress that carriers receive a compensation as will enable them to properly maintain their equipments, in which case it is manifestly essential that carriers on routes of 24 or more miles should be given greater compensation than those serving routes of less mileage, some of which it is practicable to cover with one horse, while on all routes of 24 or more miles two or more horses are necessary, the following schedule, which is now in effect, was adopted July 1, 1907:

	Per annum.
6 to 8 miles	$396
8 to 10 miles	432
16 to 18 miles	630
18 to 20 miles	720
20 to 22 miles	810
22 to 24 miles	864
24 miles and over	900

Trusting that you will find the information herein given satisfactory, I am,

Very respectfully,

R. H. PRENDERS,
Acting Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, February 26, 1908.

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES, House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to your request to be furnished with data giving the average cost of subsistence of rural carriers, including shoeing, repairs, etc., and the average income derived by rural carriers from carrying unmailable matter outside of the mails for hire, I beg leave to say that from the data at hand, which was collected about eighteen months ago, it is found that the average annual cost of maintaining a rural carrier's vehicle and team is about $250. This includes forage, repairing, shoeing, blankets, and veterinary service. The average cost of horses and vehicles, as computed from the data at hand, is about $275, and, estimating the period of usefulness of carrier's vehicle and horses at five years, would represent an annual deterioration in a carrier's vehicle and horses of about $55, which, together with the cost of maintenance of carrier's vehicle and team of $250 per year, would make the average total cost to the carrier about $305 per annum.

The foregoing figures were derived from data showing the cost of keep for two or more horses to each carrier. It was found that a majority of the carriers use more than one horse, and that some of them use as many as four horses. The monthly cost of keep of horses varies in the different sections of the country, being as low as $6 per month in some sections, and as high as $15 per month in other sections. Of course, there is a large number of carriers who produce their own horse feed, which requires no actual outlay of money, but this number is not known; consequently the deductions are made from those carriers who pay for the keep of horses out of their salaries as carriers.

The Department has never collected data showing the income derived by carriers in carrying unmailable matter for hire, and can not state, even approximately, the average amount earned per annum by each carrier in this manner.

Very respectfully,

P. V. DE GRAW,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, at the closing session of the Fifty-ninth Congress a bill was passed reclassifying the salaries of post-office clerks and letter carriers, and it was thought by the Member interested in the measure that it would provide six grades, with annual promotions ranging from $600 to $1,200, in first-class post-offices, and four grades, ranging from $600 to $1,000, in second-class offices. Provisions were made in the post-office appropriation bill to provide for all necessary increases for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and the letter carriers and clerks in the fifth grade had been looking forward to promotion to the sixth, or $1,200 grade, beginning July 1 next. We find, however, that the bill now under discussion does not make provision for the single promotion of a letter carrier to the sixth grade, notwithstanding the fact that the First Assistant Postmaster-General made a recommendation for the promotion of at least 50 per cent of the carriers. I find in going over the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General that he makes a statement to the effect that—

The new salary law has accomplished much toward raising the efficiency of post-offices to a higher standard, and has placed the compensation of postal employees on a substantial and satisfactory foundation, making it possible for the Department to retain efficient clerks and carriers, and to induce other high-grade men to seek employment in the service. Postmasters and special agents of the Department state that the new legislation is not only bringing better men into the service, but has caused marked improvement in the quality of the work done by employees previously appointed. The higher compensation and greater opportunity for advancement offered have checked the alarming increase in the rate of resignation from the service, while the number of applicants for appointment has so increased that little difficulty is anticipated in filling future vacancies.

The passage of the reclassification act has undoubtedly infused into the great army of post-office employees a new spirit of enthusiasm for the service and of loyalty to the Department, the effect of which can not be overestimated.

If Congress passes this appropriation bill in its present form without making any provisions whatever for promotions of these men to the $1,200 grade, to my mind it can have only one effect, and that is to cause disappointment and discontent among the employees. As the Members of the House are well aware of the great number of resignations from the clerk and carrier service prior to the passage of the new salary law, I believe it is the duty of the House to encourage and foster the spirit now prevailing among these employees of the Government by making an appropriation which will provide for their promotion to the sixth grade, as Congress had intended when the law was enacted one year ago.

I also noted in the recommendations of First Assistant Postmaster-General Hitchcock a strong recommendation for thirty days' annual leave of absence for the letter carriers and postal clerks. This gentleman, who made a careful study of the service and the conditions surrounding the employees, stated:

Post-office employees are allowed by law fifteen days' leave of absence with pay each year. Most of the other employees of the Government, whether in the Executive Departments at Washington or stationed elsewhere, receive thirty days' annual leave. There seems to be no good reason for such discrimination against postal employees. Nowhere in the entire Government establishment are the hours of service longer, the conditions of employment more trying, or the amount of overtime work greater than in our post-offices. There is consequently no class of Federal employees more in need of a considerable period of complete relief from their duties each year than those connected with the postal service. The policy of granting thirty days' annual vacation could be extended with advantage to every branch of this service. A longer period of rest and recreation would undoubtedly result in bettering the health of the employees and increasing their working capacity. It is believed also that the prospect of receiving a month's vacation with full pay would have a greater influence in attracting capable men to the service than any other inducement that could be offered at equal expense. As a rule, a post-office clerk prizes his fifteen days' annual leave of absence (which costs the Government less than $5) more than he would value an addition to his salary of several times that amount. Carriers' vacations are more expensive, as hitherto it has been deemed necessary to provide a substitute for every carrier on leave, whereas clerks "double up" during the vacation season, when business is light, and perform the work of absentees with comparatively little additional help. Nevertheless, the carriers undoubtedly value their annual leave of absence far above its cost.

It is important to make employment in the postal service attractive. Inability to secure competent employees, especially in the West, has been for years one of the most serious difficulties confronting the Department. The only effective method of solving the problem is to increase the salaries and to improve the conditions of employment. Inasmuch as the positions of clerk and carrier are open to public competition, the character of the men secured will depend directly on the inducements offered. The beneficial result of a general increase in salaries is already apparent. A lengthening of the period of annual vacation would have a similar effect.

I heartily concur in the sentiment expressed by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, knowing as I do the conditions under which these men work. Should a letter carrier meet with injuries during the performance of his duties, his salary ceases at once and he is left to shift for himself unless he be fortunate enough to be a member of the Letter Carriers' Association, in which event his brothers in the service look after his personal wants during his illness. If this additional leave of absence was given to the clerks and carriers they would have an opportunity when their health became impaired to lay off a few days for the purpose of recuperating, and in the end I believe it would be a saving to the Government by insuring efficient service by healthy and contented men at all times. All employees of the Government service in the Departments have been enjoying thirty days' annual leave for years, and I do not believe there is a single Member of Congress who would take away from them this privilege. I therefore hope and trust that the committee can see their way clear to present this matter to the House when the bill comes to a vote.

I would also like to enlighten the House on another matter regarding the trials and hardships under which the letter carrier serves during his apprenticeship before receiving a regular salary from the Government. After passing the required civil-service examination and receiving a standing high enough on the eligible list he is sent for by the local postmaster and sworn in in the regular manner and is told he must procure a uniform at his own expense, after which he shall report for duty. This requirement having been attended to, the new recruit, full of hope and ambition, returns to the post-office only to find that instead of receiving an appointment at a regular salary he must first serve as a substitute, for which service he receives a compensation of 30 cents an hour, and employment is only given him when the regular carriers are off on their vacations or when they become sick and disabled and unable to perform their regular duties. This apprenticeship varies in time, and I have been informed that the average throughout the country is about three years, and that during this period of time they eke out a very precarious living. Now, gentlemen, the law passed at the last session of Congress aimed to better the conditions of these men, but I am sorry to say that they have not benefited much, if any. I would ask the committee and the Members of this House in simple justice to the substitute carriers to allow them pay for a full eight hours on Sundays and holidays when they are employed on these days. Under the present system if a substitute carrier works on Sundays and holidays he is only paid at the rate of 30 cents an hour for the actual number of hours he is employed. I do not know of any other class of employment where such an unsatisfactory condition of affairs exists, and it certainly is a rank injustice to these men. When they are working in the places of regular carriers off duty without pay a full day's wages is deducted from the salary of the regular carrier by the Government, but the substitute who performs all of the service on that Sunday or holiday is only paid 30 cents an hour for the three or four hours he might work, notwithstanding the fact that his hour for reporting at the office is 6 o'clock in the morning, when the average citizen is lying asleep in his bed. Now, gentlemen, these are facts that I trust you will give your most earnest consideration, and I feel satisfied if you do that you will grant these few concessions that I ask in the name of equity and justice.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowance to third-class post-offices to cover the cost of clerical services in offices where the salaries of the postmasters range from $1,600 to $1,900, $625,000: Provided, That no allowance in excess of $400 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,600 or $1,700; nor in excess of $500 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, lines 12 and 13, strike out $28,661,500 and insert $28,681,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 13, page 11, insert:

"That after June 30, 1908, clerks, letter carriers, and other employees in first and second class post-offices and in other post-offices having city-delivery service may be granted leave of absence with full pay for not exceeding thirty days in a fiscal year."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve the point.

[Mr. GOLDFOGLE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on his point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment undoubtedly violates the law, which says that new legislation shall not be carried on an appropriation bill. The point of order is therefore sustained.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Referring to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], I beg to say that for the purpose of extending the period of leaves of absence in the postal service there have been some bills introduced, and they are now pending on the Calendar in the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department. Nobody has asked for any hearing upon them. So far as performing the functions of the committee and dealing with the matter, the committee has no information that any Member of the House is interested in the subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Since when has that committee become vitalized so that anybody could find the committee and ask it to give a hearing on any question? It has been moribund since I have been in Congress for the last nine years.

Mr. WANGER. My friend from New York has been slumbering. The committee has been vitalized by the Speaker of the House in appointing the committees. The committee has been ready and willing—I do not say that I can conscientiously say that it has been anxious [laughter]—to discharge its duties.

They have discovered that instead of an effort to hinder it in the discharge of its duties fixed upon it by the rules of the House, as was the disagreeable experience of the chairman a couple of years ago, there is at least an assurance of support in the performance of duty, and the committee was organized in the latter part of January and has been meeting frequently since that time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Were these bills referred to the gentleman's committee before or after the committee took life again?

Mr. WANGER. Does my friend mean by "taking life again"—well I will say that it was since the committee was appointed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. To relieve the gentleman from embarrassment——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is nothing before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moved to strike out the last word, and he is speaking to the amendment.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a very brief statement. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has called the attention of the House to an important fact, and that is that a certain class of bills which heretofore has been referred to the great Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has in this session of Congress been taken from that committee and sent to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department. In view of the history of the committee and the gentleman's statement, it occurs to me that perhaps these bills have not been referred to the gentleman's committee in order that hearings may be had upon them, but that they were deliberately referred to the gentleman's committee because it is a notorious fact that it would be an utter impossibility to have the committee meet and give anybody interested a hearing upon the bill.

Mr. WANGER. Oh, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, if there has been a change and the committee is in readiness to do business, I wish to assure the gentleman that any number of Members of the House will be delighted to give the gentleman's committee all the opportunity he desires to consider measures before his committee. Mr. Chairman, since there is objection to this important amendment, with the permission of the House I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order that there is no question before the House.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I must object for the present to the gentleman withdrawing his amendment, for I wish to inform him that when he says the bills were referred to this committee, knowing that meetings would not be called and that no action could be taken, I refer him to the record of the Fifty-eighth Congress when action was taken by the committee and it was sought to exercise the jurisdiction which the rules apparently gave but was denied by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman suspend a moment? The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to make the point of order that there was nothing before the committee.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I did, and the Chair has not decided it yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asked unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania objected, so that the amendment is still before the committee.

Mr. WANGER. I merely wanted to inform my friend from New York that the committee had met and acted in the Fifty-eighth Congress upon all matters in which it was requested to act by anybody.

Mr. OVERSTREET. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What motion is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the argument is not germane to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now understands that the gentleman makes the point of order that the debate must be germane to the amendment, which is correct.

Mr. WANGER. I understand that, Mr. Chairman. I propose to proceed in order upon the pending amendment, and to withdraw my objection to the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to withdraw his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] for unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment, being withdrawn, the amendment will be considered as itself withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum, and the assignment of the several grades of compensation to the various offices shall be made, so far as practicable, in proportion to the amount of business transacted through such offices and the respective divisions thereof.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. As I understand the classification of last year, it provides for the so-called "automatic promotions" within the discretion of the postmaster.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, no; not within his discretion. Every clerk and carrier of relative grades defined by the statute are automatically promoted when they have served one year in the next lower grade, and have a proper efficiency record.

Mr. MANN. I used the term "discretion" possibly a little erroneously—within the discretion of the postmaster as to the efficiency of the clerk, so that if the postmaster finds that a clerk in the $600 grade has been efficient, he must promote him to the $800 grade, and from the $800 to the $900 grade. If the postmaster finds the clerk is efficient, he is absolutely entitled to his promotion, regardless of the appropriation, and if there is not a sufficient appropriation, then the man has a right to make his claim in the Court of Claims.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, I presume if there were no appropriation at all, if for any cause the appropriation failed, the employee whose promotion and pay are provided for under the classification act would undoubtedly have a right of action in the Court of Claims. The method, however, of the promotion, so far as it is determinable by the efficiency record of the employee, as I stated a while ago, has not been entirely satisfactory. There ought to be a uniform standard of efficiency similar throughout the country; but in the absence of that the standard is governed by the boards of efficiency in the various post-offices.

Mr. MANN. It is practically the discretion of the postmaster as to the efficiency. I am not raising a question about that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will permit me to read into the RECORD just that provision of the law I think it will be a good idea:

No promotion shall be made except upon evidence satisfactory to the Post-Office Department of the efficiency and faithfulness of the employee during the preceding year.

That puts primarily upon the Post-Office Department the final determination of the efficiency record, but the Post-Office Department can not send committees around to all of the offices to make inquiry into the individual cases, and therefore they leave the determination of the first recommendation for efficiency to such board of efficiency as the local postmaster may himself provide.

Mr. MANN. Now, this year there was a deficiency in the appropriation, which has already been provided for.

Mr. OVERSTREET. And may occur at any time under well-known conditions.

Mr. MANN. Can it occur under this provision of the bill—

And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum—and the sum referred to is the sum of $28,661,500?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The reason of that limitation is this: That taking a table of the various grades of employment from the $600 grade to the $3,200 grade, of which there are eight, if you multiply each separate salary, as determined by the grade, by the total number of employees authorized under the law, it will make a greater sum than $28,661,500. But because of the fact that all of the promotions do not fall upon the first of the new fiscal year, and because of the further fact that all of the new appointments for the new service do not occur upon the first of the fiscal year, it will require less money than the total which would be calculated by the multiplication suggested.

Mr. MANN. That is a new thing in the bill, is it not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is not new in the bill. It has been carried in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not mean this provision, but I mean the idea of not making the appropriation sufficient; but I am not complaining about that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The current law carries the same identical provision, and it is carried under each of the various groups of employment in the service.

Wherever the total number of employees authorized, multiplied by the maximum salary, would make a greater sum than this sum, this limitation is provided.

Mr. MANN. It is not intended, then, in any way at all to affect the promotion?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; not at all.

Mr. MANN. Apparently it does. Apparently it prohibits a deficiency.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I stated a while ago, Mr. Chairman, and I think it will bear repetition, that this total sum of $28,661,500 for employment of clerks in first and second class offices is determinable upon the following basis:

First, we take into account all of the employees in the service on the 30th day of June, 1908, and calculate for all of those at the maximum salary which they will at that date be receiving. Then we calculate next the amount necessary to take care of the arbitrary promotions of the various grades of employees. Then we add the amount at the lower, or $600, grade which in the judgment of the Department and of the committee, upon careful calculation, will be necessary for the new clerks who may be appointed during the year. Now, we provide in this bill for 2,420 additional clerks to be newly appointed in these offices during the next fiscal year. All of them will not be appointed on the 1st of July, but we calculate that a certain number will be appointed on the 1st of October and each succeeding quarter. I think the annual rate for the new clerks is based upon about $425 per year. And the limitation is held by experts in making estimates to Congress, and particularly is that true of the clerk of the Appropriation Committee, that without this limitation the calculation at the Treasury would be made upon the total amount for the total period.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I understand the Clerk had read as far as line 21 on page 11.

The CHAIRMAN. To the end of line 20.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18347—the post-office appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

UNITED STATES BATTLE SHIP "MAINE."

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to send to the House of Representatives, as early as may be practicable, all letters and data as to the present international status and rights, if any there be, under which the Congress may exercise immediate or future action for the removal of the wreck of the United States battle ship Maine and provide proper burial for its dead, now lying with the hulk in the harbor of Habana, Cuba.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "present international" and the words "and rights, if any there be" and insert in line 4, after the word "the," the words "cost and legal."

In line 8 strike out the words "proper" and "its," and insert after the word "for" the word "the."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MINORITY VIEWS ON FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the minority views upon the bill H. R. 12677 not later than Saturday the 21st.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LAND ENTRIES WITHIN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11778) entitled "A bill to amend an act approved June 11, 1906, entitled 'An act to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves.'"

The SPEAKER. The bill was read on a former day. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill was not before the House a few days ago and if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] did not object to its consideration?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes, sir. He is agreeable that the matter be taken up at this time and passed. He told me yesterday that I might call the matter up again if I desired, and he would not interpose an objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He has stated that he has withdrawn, in effect, his objection?

Mr. SMITH of California. What is that?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that the gentleman from Mississippi withdraws his objection?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman now explain to the House what the bill is?

Mr. SMITH of California. The last Congress passed a bill allowing the Forestry Department to indicate certain small tracts of land here and there in forest reserves which might then be homestead. A portion of California was excluded from that bill, and this now aims to put a portion of the State under the operation of that law, giving it the same status with all other forest reserves of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what the attitude of the Forestry Bureau is?

Mr. SMITH of California. They requested me to introduce the bill and are very anxious that it be passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the homestead entry is the same size as the ordinary entry, or whether it enlarges it?

Mr. SMITH of California. It does not enlarge it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of California. I will ask that the letter be printed, if gentlemen do not desire to have it read now.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the letter will be printed.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, March 4, 1908.

Hon. S. C. SMITH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of March 3 to the Forester is received in his absence. The bill (H. R. 11778) concerning the entry of agricultural lands within national forests will, if enacted, extend the benefits of the act of June 11, 1906, to southern California. The Forester believes that this should be done. Under that act no land is taken up until it is found by examination on the ground to be more valuable for agriculture than for forest purposes, and there is no danger that any land which should be kept forested will pass into private ownership.

It was inevitable that there should be in the great bodies of land reserved for national forests small and isolated tracts along creek bottoms and the like more suited for farming than for forest purposes. The act of June 11, 1906, enables such tracts to be put to their most beneficial use and is in entire harmony with the national forest policy, which is, in brief, that all the resources of the national forests should be developed to their fullest capacity.

Very truly, yours,
JAMES B. ADAMS,
Associate Forester.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of California, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ARIZONA AND CALIFORNIA RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Indian Affairs from the consideration of the bill S. 2948, and that the same may be considered in the House at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2948) to provide additional station grounds and terminal facilities for the Arizona and California Railway Company in the Colorado River Indian Reservation, Ariz.

Be it enacted, etc., That, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, additional lands not exceeding 40 acres in area adjacent to its approved right of way in the Colorado River Indian Reservation, in the Territory of Arizona, be, and the same are hereby, granted for additional station grounds and terminal facilities to the Arizona and California Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of said Territory, subject to the payment by said company of full compensation therefor in the manner provided in section 3 of the act approved March 2, 1899, entitled "An act to provide for the acquiring of rights of way by railroad companies through Indian reservations, Indian lands, Indian allotments, and for other purposes:" Provided, That such additional lands are granted subject to the right of the United States to cross the same and the works constructed thereon with canals or water conduits of any kind, or with roadways, or transmission lines for telephone, telegraph, or electric power, which may in the future be built by the United States across such lands; and the said company shall build and maintain at its own expense all structures that may be required at crossings, and in accepting this grant shall release the United States from all damages which may result from the construction and use of such crossings, canals, conduits, and lines.

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to reserve the right to object.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill is identical with a House bill which has been favorably reported, unanimously, by the Committee on Indian Affairs. The purpose of this bill is to grant a right to the railroad company to take additional station grounds. The general law permitting the granting of station grounds provides for an addition to the right of way of 200 feet by 1,000 feet long, and such a right only every 10 miles. Now, here it is desired, where a terminal to the road is being constructed, to acquire title to a piece of ground large enough to construct a Y and build engine houses and build certain employees' residences, put in water tanks, and the like of that. The bill provides that the compensation therefor shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proviso to the bill now presented also provides that the right of way shall be reserved to the United States for all irrigation work and everything of that kind. It seems to me that the bill as presented safeguards all possible rights of the United States and of the Indians.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman state to the House through whose land the right of way is to go?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is to go into the Colorado Indian Reservation; and there is a general act which gives to anybody the right to acquire a right of way under certain conditions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What are they going to be paid?

Mr. SHERMAN. Whatever the Secretary of the Interior says; and under the general act the price which he fixes is final.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How wide is the strip going to be?

Mr. SHERMAN. Forty acres in size.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And that is to be given every 10 miles?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; it is only at one place, at a place of junction between two division points; at a point where they can obtain water, put in a roundhouse, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Forty acres is enough to build a pretty good town on.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I understand they want to do; to build up a working town for the people who work on that railroad.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the width of the right of way?

Mr. SHERMAN. The right of way is 100 feet wide, the station grounds 200 feet wide by 1,000 feet in length.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And it can not be had for anything less than what the Secretary of the Interior says?

Mr. SHERMAN. It can not be sold for less than he fixes the price.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 5155. An act authorizing the exchange of lands for the enlargement of maneuvering grounds.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 598. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 13102. An act to authorize the county of Elmore, Ala., to construct a bridge across Coosa River, Alabama.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 11, 1908.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

SEAL ISLANDS IN ALASKA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, by direction of the President and in response to the resolution of the 2d instant, certain reports relating to the Alaskan seal fisheries, and requesting, as the reports transmitted are original ones, that if it is not the purpose of the Senate to publish them they be returned to the files of the Department of Commerce and Labor, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Fisheries and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2948) to provide additional station grounds and terminal facilities for the Arizona and California Railway Company in the Colorado River Indian Reservation, Ariz.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 11778. An act to amend an act approved June 11, 1906, entitled "An act to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves;" and

H. J. Res. 148. Joint resolution donating to the Commonwealth of Oklahoma the new flag now floating over the National Capital.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 5155. An act authorizing the exchange of lands for the enlargement of maneuvering grounds; and

H. R. 2429. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain and other wars, and to the widows of such soldiers and sailors.

THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. HALE. I present the memorial of sundry citizens of New York City, remonstrating against the great addition to the Navy involved in the plan of authorizing at once the construction of four new battle ships. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD, with the names attached; that it also be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, together with the names, also as a document, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

To the Representatives and Senators in Congress:

We, the undersigned citizens of New York City, voicing, as we believe, the sentiments of many thousands of American citizens, earnestly protest against the extravagant demand for an addition of over $60,000,000 in the form of four new battle ships, cruisers, etc., to the naval budget of last year, inasmuch as no danger threatens the country not known last April when President Roosevelt told the world: "We are no longer enlarging our Navy. We are simply keeping up its strength. The addition of one battle ship a year barely enables us to make good the units which become obsolete."

Sixty-five per cent of the national income is now expended on war past and present. The increase of our naval budget has recently been used in the French Assembly as a reason for increasing its own; is largely responsible for the increase of armaments among Asiatic nations; and is well-nigh certain to retard that reduction in the armaments of the world for which we have so long been waiting.

The growing discontent throughout the world at the appalling increase of waste of national resources must be heeded. We feel that this protest is the more necessary inasmuch as there are various new and effective methods now available for promoting international friendship and rationally settling difficulties, which these new demands seem to ignore.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17277) for the relief of George S. Patten, of Williams, Coconino County, Ariz., reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3207) for the relief of the White River Utes, the Southern Utes, the Uncompahgre Utes, the Tabeguache, Muache, Weeminuche, Yampa, Grand River, and Unita bands of Ute Indians, known also as the "Confederated Bands of Ute Indians of Colorado," reported adversely thereon and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3530) to provide for the erection of a public building at Oklahoma City, Okla., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 to enable the United States suitably to participate in the International Congress on Tuberculosis to be held in the city of Washington, September, 1908, intended to be proposed to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 124) to establish a Government building at the town of Pocatello, County of Bannock, State of Idaho, reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 68) providing for additional lands for Idaho under the provisions of the Carey Act, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 513) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Maryville, in the State of Missouri, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BURKETT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1072) to authorize the extension and enlargement of the post-office building at Fremont, Nebr., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report thereon.

SUPERANNUATION IN THE CLASSIFIED CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States transmitting a report by the Committee on Department Methods on the subject of superannuation in the classified civil service, etc., asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, which was agreed to.

CHANDLER BASSETT.

Mr. FULTON. I report back from the Committee on Public Lands, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 12803) allowing Chandler Bassett to perfect final proof in his homestead entry, and I submit a report thereon. It is a private bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE SENATOR REDFIELD PROCTOR.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. DILLINGHAM, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice-President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator from the State of Vermont, Hon. REDFIELD PROCTOR, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEPHENSON introduced a bill (S. 6048) to provide that no conveyance of lands allotted to Indians on the Stockbridge Munsee Reservation, Wis., shall be valid without the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WETMORE introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6049) granting an increase of pension to Lewis Holley; and

A bill (S. 6050) granting a pension to Ella Richmond Shaw.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 6051) providing for the placing of marble columns and entablature on the post-office building at Charlottesville, Va., which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6052) authorizing the Secretary of War to have constructed a direct road leading from the southern end of the new highway bridge across the Potomac River to the national cemetery at Arlington and Fort Myer, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HEYBURN introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment relative to the construction of a public road near the southern end of the new highway bridge across the Potomac River to a convenient point on or near the southern boundary line of the Arlington reservation, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NIXON submitted an amendment providing that whenever a postmaster certifies to the Post-Office Department that, owing to unusual conditions in his community, he is unable to procure the services of efficient employees, etc., the Department may, in its discretion, authorize the appointment of clerks and letter carriers for that office, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. PLATT submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. STONE submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate whether the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, created by Congress a corporation by act of July 2, 1864, hath ceased to exercise the functions for which it was created, and if so, whether there exists any reason why its Federal charter should not be repealed or why legal proceedings for the forfeiture of such charter should not be instituted by the Government.

SURVEY OF GALVESTON HARBOR, TEXAS.

Mr. BAILEY submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey of Galveston Harbor, as a whole, including Galveston Harbor, Galveston channel, Texas City channel, and Port Bolivar channel, in the State of Texas, for the purpose of establishing a broad, comprehensive, and systematic plan for the future extension, enlargement, and deepening of said harbor, so as to meet the growing needs of commerce, and to estimate the probable cost thereof.

UNITED STATES V. THAYER—CONTRIBUTIONS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I rise to make a request for printing. On the 9th instant the Supreme Court of the United States passed upon the question of soliciting contributions for campaign purposes under the act of January 16, 1883. The opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes is of general interest, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Supreme Court of the United States. No. 390. October term, 1907. The United States, plaintiff in error, v. Edward S. Thayer. In error to the district court of the United States for the northern district of Texas. March 9, 1908.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an indictment for soliciting a contribution of money for political purposes from an employee of the United States in a post-office building of the United States occupied by the employee in the discharge of his duties. By the civil-service act of January 16, 1883 (chap. 27, sec. 12, 22 Stat. 403, 407), "No person shall, in any room or building occupied in the discharge of official duties by any officer or employee of the United States mentioned in this act, or in any navy-yard, fort, or arsenal, solicit in any manner whatever, or receive any contribution

Of course it is possible to solicit by letter as well as in person. It is equally clear that the person who writes the letter and intentionally puts it in the way of delivery solicits, whether the delivery is accomplished by agents of the writer, by agents of the person addressed, or by independent middlemen, if it takes place in the intended way. It appears to us no more open to doubt that the statute prohibits solicitation by writing as well as by spoken words. It forbids all persons to solicit "in any manner whatever." The purpose is wider than that of a notice prohibiting book peddling in a building. It is not, even primarily, to save employees from interruption or annoyance in their business. It is to check a political abuse, which is not different in kind, whether practiced by letter or by word of mouth. The limits of the act, presumably, were due to what was considered the reasonable and possibly the constitutional freedom of citizens, whether office-holders or not, when in private life, and it may be conjectured that it was upon this ground that an amendment of broader scope was rejected. If the writer of the letter in person had handed it to the man addressed, in the building without a word, and the latter had read it then and there, we suppose that no one would deny that the writer fell within the statute. We can see no distinction between personally delivering the letter and sending it by a servant of the writer. If the solicitation is in the building, the statute does not require personal presence, so that the question is narrowed to whether the solicitation alleged took place in the building or outside.

The solicitation was made at some time, somewhere. The time determines the place. It was not complete when the letter was dropped into the post. If the letter had miscarried or had been burned, the defendant would not have accomplished a solicitation. The court below was misled by cases in which, upon an indictment for obtaining money by false pretenses, the crime was held to have been committed at the place where drafts were put into the post by the defrauded person. (Commonwealth v. Wood, 142 Mass., 459, 462; Regina v. Jones, 4 Cox C. C., 198.) But these stand on the analogy of the acceptance by mail of an offer and throw no light. A relation already existed between the parties, and it is because of that relation that posting the letter made the transaction complete. (See Brauer v. Shaw, 168 Mass., 198, 200.) Here a relation was to be established, just as there is at the first stage of a contract when an offer is to be made. Whether or not, as Mr. Langdell thinks, nothing less than bringing the offer to the actual consciousness of the person addressed would do (Contra., sec. 151) certainly putting a letter into a post-office is neither an offer nor a solicitation. "An offer is nothing until it is communicated to the party to whom it is made." (Thomson v. James, 18 Ct. of Sess. Cas. (2d series), 1, 10, 15.) Therefore, we repeat, until after the letter had entered the building the offense was not complete, but, when it had been read, the case was not affected by the nature of the intended means by which it was put into the hands of the person addressed. Neither can the case be affected by speculations as to what the position would have been if the receiver had put the letter in his pocket and had read it later at home. Offenses usually depend for their completion upon events that are not wholly within the offender's control and that may turn out in different ways.

No difficulty is raised by the coupling of solicitation and receipt in the statute. If receipt required personal presence, it still would be obvious that "solicit in any manner whatever" was a broader term. But the cases that have been relied upon to establish that the solicitation did not happen in the building, although inadequate for that, do sufficiently show that the money might be received there without the personal presence of the defendant. If, in answer to the defendant's letter, the parties addressed had posted money to him in the building where they were employed, the money undoubtedly would have been received there. To sum up, the defendant solicited money for campaign purposes, he did not solicit until his letter actually was received in the building, he did solicit when it was received and read there, and the solicitation was in the place where the letter was received. We observe that this is the opinion expressed by the Civil Service Commission in a note upon this section, and the principle of our decision is similar to that recognized in several cases in this court. (In re Palliser, 136 U. S., 257, 266; Horner v. United States, 143 U. S., 207, 214; Burton v. United States, 202 U. S., 344, 387 et seq.) We do not cite them more at length, as the only dispute possible is on the meaning of the particular words that Congress has used.

We may add that this case does not raise the questions presented by an act done in one jurisdiction and producing effects in another which threatens the actor with punishment if it can catch him. Decisions in that class of cases, however, illustrate the indisputable general proposition that a man sometimes may be punished where he has brought consequences to pass, although he was not there in person. They are cited in In re Palliser, sup. Here the defendant was within and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to the extent of its constitutional power, and the power is not in dispute. (Ex parte Curtis, 106 U. S., 371; United States v. Newton, 9 Mackey (D. C.), 226.)

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 11778. An act to amend an act approved June 11, 1906, entitled "An act to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

On December 12, 1906, the Secretary of War by my direction issued the following order:

"Applications to reenlist from former members of Companies B, C, and D, Twenty-fifth Infantry, who were discharged under the provisions of Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, November 9, 1906, must be made in writing and be accompanied by such evidence, also in writing, as the applicant may desire to submit to show that he was neither implicated in the raid on Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13, 1906, nor withheld any evidence that might lead to the discovery of the perpetrators thereof."

Proceedings were begun under this order, but shortly thereafter an investigation was directed by the Senate, and the proceedings under the order were stopped. The Senate committee intrusted with the work has now completed its investigation and finds that the facts upon which my order of discharge of November 9, 1906, was based are substantiated by the evidence. The testimony secured by the committee is therefore now available and I desire to revive the order of December 12, 1906, and to have it carried out in whatever shape may be necessary to achieve the purpose therein set forth, any additional evidence being taken which may be of aid in the ascertainment of the truth. The time limit during which it was possible to reinstate any individual soldier in accordance with the terms of this order has, however, expired. I therefore recommend the passage of a law extending this time limit, so far as the soldiers concerned are affected, until a year after the passage of the law, and permitting the reinstatement by direction of the President of any man who, in his judgment, shall appear not to be within the class whose discharge was deemed necessary in order to maintain the discipline and morale of the Army.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 11, 1908.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Committee on Military Affairs begs leave to make the following report. I will ask that the report, being very short, may be read at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, pursuant to the authority and direction given it by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That, without questioning the legality or justice of any act of the President in relation thereto, the Committee on Military Affairs is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to take and have printed testimony for the purpose of ascertaining all the facts with reference to or connected with the affray at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906. Said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to sit during sessions or recess of the Senate, and, if deemed advisable, at Brownsville, or elsewhere; the expenses of the investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate," hereby reports to the Senate due performance of the duty imposed upon it, and presents herewith three large volumes of testimony given before the committee, two volumes of proceedings of general courts-martial, which sat in San Antonio, Tex., to investigate certain charges growing out of the Brownsville affray, and one volume (in three parts) containing the President's messages regarding the Brownsville affray (S. Doc. 155, 59th Cong., 2d sess., pts. 1 and 2); letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting additional testimony and exhibits (pt. 3); these volumes covering, in all, nearly 6,000 pages. Each volume of matter has been fully and carefully indexed under the direction of your committee for the convenience of the Senate.

The committee commenced taking testimony February 4, 1907, and continued until June 14, 1907. Meetings were again resumed November 18, 1907, and concluded March 10, 1908. One hundred and sixty or more witnesses were brought before the committee and testified under direct and cross examination. All documents (regular and irregular), printed matter, letters, telegrams, petitions, etc., pertaining to the case were laid before the committee and received due consideration.

There is considerable contradiction in the testimony; much of it is, however, upon irrelevant and immaterial points. Taking the evidence as a whole and reconciling it where possible, and giving it due and proper weight in view of admitted facts and circumstances, your committee has considered and agreed to the following resolutions:

First. That in the opinion of this committee the shooting in the affray at Brownsville, on the night of August 13–14, 1906, was done by some of the soldiers belonging to the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, then stationed at Fort Brown, Tex.

Second. That the testimony fails to identify the particular soldier or soldiers who participated in the shooting affray at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906.

The following facts, in the opinion of your committee, have been proven and established:

About the hour of midnight on the night of August 13–14, 1906, a number of soldiers of the First Battalion, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, then stationed at Fort Brown, Tex., armed with the new-model (1903) Springfield rifle and Government ammunition, then in use in that battalion, jumped over the wall of the Government reservation separating the post from the town, went hurriedly into the near-by town of Brownsville, and wantonly shot into the houses and attacked the citizens thereof. This squad of soldiers, numbering, perhaps, not less then eight nor more than twenty, deliberately attacked and shot at citizens wherever seen in the streets and shot into many houses. They fired into hotels filled with guests and into residences occupied by men, women, and children. In fact their conduct indicated a wanton purpose to terrorize the inhabitants of the town and to kill and destroy with utter and reckless disregard of age, sex, or condition of helplessness. In carrying out their unlawful purpose they respected neither the sanctity of the home nor the innocence and helplessness of women and children. They fired into houses where women and children were sleeping, in some instances the bullets passing through the rooms and only a few feet over the beds in which the people were lying.

In this midnight raid one unoffending citizen, Frank Natus, was killed in his place of business; the lieutenant of police, M. Ygnacio Dominguez, was so severely wounded in the arm that amputation was necessary; the horse he was riding was killed under him; and the inhabitants of the town, men, women, and children, were aroused to a high state of excitement and fear.

We believe that the above facts are clearly established by incontestable evidence. Fifteen eyewitnesses testified that they saw and recognized the raiders who did the shooting as persons dressed in the uniforms of United States soldiers, with guns, and most of these witnesses recognized them as negroes. Two witnesses testified that they saw a number of men (one recognizing them as soldiers) on the inside of the wall of the reservation, moving rapidly to the point where they went over the wall. Five witnesses testified to firing occurring inside the wall of the fort. One witness heard voices inside the wall of the reservation calling to others to "hurry up!" to "jump!" etc., and heard the men when they jumped the wall and proceeded up the alley where the firing continued. Several witnesses who were situated so as not to be able to see, heard the voices of members of the attacking party, and recognized them as the voices of negroes. They spoke in English. One witness saw a negro soldier with his gun returning from the direction of the town where the firing had occurred, and saw him enter the reservation immediately after the shooting had ceased. Three witnesses testified as to having seen the men carrying their guns, running back in the direction of the fort immediately after the shooting ceased, and others to having heard them. The greatest distance from the fort at which any firing occurred did not exceed 350 yards, and the entire time consumed in the raid was probably not more than ten or twelve minutes.

These witnesses, so far as the committee could ascertain, were respectable and trustworthy people; no one of them was impeached, neither was his or her reputation for honesty or truthfulness seriously questioned. The testimony of these witnesses alone would be sufficient to establish the fact beyond reasonable question that the shooting was done by negro soldiers, and there were no negro soldiers in that part of the country except those of Companies B, C, and D, of the Twenty-fifth Infantry.

But there are other facts and circumstances corroborative of the positive testimony of the eyewitnesses, which, when taken in connection therewith, are conclusive of the guilt of some of said soldiers.

First. There is no evidence whatever on which to base a claim that the shooting was done by any person or persons other than by soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry. There was no class of people or individuals in that vicinity known to entertain any hostility toward the people of Brownsville. There was no friction between the citizens and the police, nor ill feeling of one part of the citizenship against any other part.

Second. Early in the morning of August 14, soon after the shooting, there were picked up in the streets of Brownsville, at the points where the firing had occurred, a large number of empty shells, some loaded cartridges, clips, and one bandoleer. Of this ammunition picked up in the streets, thirty-two empty shells, seven loaded cartridges, two or three clips, and one bandoleer were presented in evidence to this committee and identified as those manufactured for and used with the Springfield rifle, model of 1903, with which the colored battalion was armed. A number of bullets were extracted from the houses into which they had been fired on the night of August 13–14, 1906, and were found to be substantially of the weight, size, and material, as shown by analyses, of those used in the Springfield rifle.

It further appears, from the marks of the four lands upon the bullets, from actual tests, and other evidence, that these cartridges, with these bullets and shells in combination, could not have been fired from any gun other than the Springfield rifle, model of 1903, and that the only rifles of that kind in that section of the country were those with which the First Battalion, Twenty-fifth Infantry, was armed.

It was further established from the sound of the explosions that the firing was from high-power rifles. Many witnesses testified to the peculiar sound made by loading the guns and working the levers in extracting the empty shells during the progress of the firing, as similar to that made by the Springfield rifles.

From the foregoing facts and circumstances and many others corroborative thereof, to be found in the voluminous evidence taken, we do not entertain any doubt that the midnight attack of August 13 and 14, 1906, on the people of Brownsville was made by members of the First Battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry.

Third. Although the committee has devoted much time to the investigation and has diligently followed every clew that has been suggested, and while the proof is abundant and conclusive that members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry were the perpetrators of this unprovoked attack, the evidence, we regret to say, fails to identify the particular soldier or soldiers who participated in the affray. It is perfectly manifest, however, both from the nature and character of the attack and the number of persons engaged in it, that it was preconcerted and probably deliberately planned and executed. And it is reasonably certain that soldiers who did not actually participate in the attack must have known of it and aided those actively engaged in it in procuring their arms and ammunition and in concealing their identity when they returned. When we consider the fact that from ten to twenty guns had to be taken from the garrison, some of them from the gun racks, supposedly locked, and located near to the sleeping bunks of the soldiers upstairs; when we consider the testimony with relation to the first firing—that it was within the reservation wall, that there were a number of shots fired from the upper porches of the barracks; when we consider the fact of the firing of volley after volley by from ten to twenty men, beginning just back of the barracks, extending into the town, and lasting from ten to twelve minutes; that this shooting began within four or five hundred feet of a guard with a sergeant and several privates on duty; that the participants had to return to the reservation after the firing had ceased and join their companies, then being formed, we are forced to the conclusion that soldiers other than those who actively participated in the raid must have known of what was taking place and were aiders and abettors thereof, either before or after the fact.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the Secretary should read the names signed to that report. It is not signed by the full committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The names will be read.

The Secretary read the names, as follows:

F. E. WARREN, H. C. LODGE, WM. WARNER, H. A. DU PONT, JAMES P. TALIAFERRO, MURPHY J. FOSTER, LEE S. OVERMAN, J. B. FRAZIER, JAMES B. MCCREARY.

Mr. WARREN. The Secretary has not read all of the report. I ask that he may read the remainder.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will complete the reading of the report.

The Secretary read as follows:

The undersigned members of your committee desire to add the following to the above report:

While under the evidence it has been shown that the assault was perpetrated by members of the aforesaid battalion, it is reasonable to believe, as appears in the report of the committee, that all the soldiers were not concerned in the commission of the crime, either as principals or accessories.

It is unquestionably true that in military administration the maintenance of discipline is ever a primary consideration and of paramount importance, for without it no degree of efficiency can be attained or preserved. Hence it will sometimes happen that honest and guiltless men must be subjected to injustice to the end that vicious men may be deprived of the opportunity to weaken or destroy the morale of the Army. In the present case, however, it would seem but justice to restore to all the innocent men of these companies the rights and privileges which had accrued to them by reason of their previous service in the Army, and of which they will be permanently deprived unless their former status shall be restored by legislation, for the reason that under existing statutes the time has already expired in which they could have reenlisted and secured the benefits of their prior service had they been honorably discharged because of the expiration of their several terms of enlistment.

On many occasions in the past the nation has had reason to be proud of the enlisted men serving in the four colored regiments of our Regular Army. The action of the soldiers who participated in or withheld knowledge of the attack on the town of Brownsville was not only a crime under the statutes of the United States, but was also a grievous wrong to their colored comrades in the Army, whose good name and fame it should have been their duty to sustain.

We recommend the enactment of a bill reading as follows:

"A bill for the relief of certain former members of the Twenty-fifth Regiment of United States Infantry.

"Be it enacted, etc., That if at any time within one year after the approval of this act the President shall be satisfied that any former enlisted man of the Twenty-fifth Regiment of United States Infantry who was discharged from the military service as a member of said regiment under the provisions of a special order, No. 266, and dated at the War Department on the 9th day of November, 1906, had no participation in or guilty knowledge of the affray that took place at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906, the President may authorize the enlistment of said men, and any man who shall enlist in the military service under authority so given by the President shall be held and considered, from the date of his enlistment under such authority, to have reenlisted on said date and to be entitled to the pay, allowances, and other rights and benefits that he would be entitled to receive from said date of enlistment if he had been honorably discharged under the provisions of the special order hereinbefore cited and had reenlisted immediately."

(Signed) F. E. WARREN.
H. C. LODGE.
WM. WARNER.
H. A. DU PONT.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this report a question.

I noticed previous to the reading of the report the reading of the message of the President on the same general subject, in which he recommends the passage of a law allowing the enlisted men of this regiment a year within which to exonerate themselves by evidence from participation in the riot. In that message the order of the President in 1906 is recited, in which he authorized reenlistment if the innocence of the enlisted men could be established.

What I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the report is why the President can not by Executive order extend the time for a year, covering the question of the order issued by him in 1906, rather than requiring a law to be passed upon the subject?

Mr. WARREN. I will tell the Senator.

Mr. SCOTT. Will not the Senator please allow me to submit the minority report, and then take this matter up after getting it all before the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to my colleague on the committee that it will take me but a moment to answer the question.

The present statutes are such that an enlisted man closes his connection with the Army and loses all rights unless he seeks to reenlist and does reenlist inside of ninety days from the date of his discharge. At the time the President issued the order the ninety days had not expired. It has expired in the meantime, so that now it requires a statute in order to enable anyone of those men to be restored to the Army with the rights of previous service, and so forth.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator's opinion is that the President is without authority to extend the order for reenlistment?

Mr. WARREN. Entirely so.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was not familiar with the law on the subject and desired to know the status of it in that respect.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to submit a minority report signed by four members of the committee, and then a supplemental report that goes with it signed by two members who had already signed the minority report. They go one step farther than the minority report. I ask to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

On August 13, 1906, about midnight, a shooting affray occurred in the city of Brownsville, Tex., in which Frank Natus, a bartender in the Ruby saloon, was killed; M. Ygnacio Dominguez, a lieutenant of police was wounded and had his horse shot under him.

At this time Companies B, C, and D of the First Battalion of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, colored, were at Fort Brown, Brownsville, Tex., which has a population of from 6,000 to 8,000 people, of which perhaps five-sixths are Mexicans. After an investigation by the War Department the following order was issued on November 9, 1906:

SPECIAL ORDERS, No. 266. WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, November 9, 1906.

1. By direction of the President, the following-named enlisted men who, on August 13, 1906, were members of Companies B, C, and D, Twenty-fifth Infantry, certain members of which organizations participated in the riotous disturbance which occurred in Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13, 1906, will be discharged without honor from the Army by their respective commanding officers and forever debarred from reenlisting in the Army or Navy of the United States, as well as from employment in any civil capacity under the Government; * * *

By order of the Acting Secretary of War:

ARTHUR MURRAY,
Chief of Artillery, Acting Chief of Staff.

Official:
HENRY P. MCCAIN,
Military Secretary.

On the —— day of December, 1906, the following resolution was adopted by the United States Senate:

"Resolved, That, without questioning the legality or justice of any act of the President in relation thereto, the Committee on Military Affairs is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to take and have printed testimony for the purpose of ascertaining all the facts with reference to or connected with the affray at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906. Said committee is authorized to send for persons or papers, to administer oaths, to sit during sessions or recess of the Senate, and, if deemed advisable, at Brownsville or elsewhere; the expenses of the investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate."

Pursuant to the above resolution, the Committee on Military Affairs took "testimony for the purpose of ascertaining all of the facts with reference to or connected with the affray at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906."

The testimony taken was as thorough as it was possible to obtain, but it is very unsatisfactory, indefinite, and conflicting in its nature.

We have been unable to arrive at any conclusions as to what motive could be alleged that the colored troops might have had to incite them to do this shooting. The only evidence produced which would in any way give the least color to a motive is the evidence that shows that there were eight gambling houses conducted in connection with saloons in the city of Brownsville, Tex.; and that while the white soldiers were stationed at Brownsville a number of them frequented the saloons and gambling houses and that these gambling houses profited largely from their patronage, and that under the rules of the gambling houses the colored soldiers could not be admitted. This resulted in great loss of business to these concerns, and it is evident that the parties engaged in the gambling and saloon business were extremely anxious to have the colored troops withdrawn from Brownsville and replaced by white soldiers. We are led to doubt, however, whether or not the gamblers who conducted these eight places in Brownsville, Tex., have given the committee as complete information as they could give in regard to this shooting affray.

While Major Penrose and other officers of the battalion at first concluded that some of the members of these companies were guilty, yet they later became convinced that the men of the battalion had nothing whatever to do with the shooting, and so testified before the Committee on Military Affairs. It should be remembered in this connection that these officers are white men, and some of them born and reared in the South.

It is proper to note in this connection that a grand jury of citizens of Cameron County, Tex., after investigation, failed to find sufficient evidence to indict the members of this battalion who were suspected and who were held at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., awaiting action by the grand jury.

We have not felt that the conflicting and circumstantial evidence given by many of those who testified against the members of this battalion should be given more consideration, and in many instances even as much consideration, as the testimony of the officers and of the soldiers themselves, many of whom had served their country loyally and faithfully for a number of years, and some of whom have been wounded in battle—having participated in the Indian wars, in the Spanish-American war and in the Philippine service.

The strongest evidence, if undisputed, implicates no greater number than from seven to twelve, and even if it were admitted for the sake of argument that from seven to twelve of these soldiers were guilty (which fact has not been proven), that fact could not, in our opinion, justify a discharge of the whole battalion without honor.

It is not our purpose, nor desire, to uphold any guilty party, nor to criticise necessary Army discipline, but we do feel that it is essential to stand by those who are giving their services to their country and who obey the law. The persons who were guilty of the shooting affray at Brownsville, Tex., should be severely punished—after they are proven guilty.

Therefore, having carefully considered all the testimony, we have reached the following conclusions:

1. The testimony wholly fails to identify the particular individuals, or any of them, who participated in the shooting affray that occurred at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906.

2. The testimony wholly fails to show that the discharged soldiers of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, or any of them, entered into any agreement or so-called "conspiracy of silence," or that they had among themselves any understanding of any nature to withhold any information of which they, or any of them, might be possessed concerning the shooting affray that occurred at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906.

3. The testimony is so contradictory, and much of it so unreliable, that it is not sufficient to sustain the charge that soldiers of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, or any of them, participated in the shooting affray that occurred at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906.

Whereas the testimony shows beyond a reasonable doubt that whatever may be the fact as to who did the shooting, many of the men so discharged were innocent of any offense in connection therewith: Therefore it is, in our opinion, the duty of Congress to provide by appropriate legislation for the correction of their record and for their reenlistment and reinstatement in the Army, and for the restoration to them of all the rights of which they have been deprived, and we so recommend.

N. B. SCOTT.
J. B. FORAKER.
J. A. HEMENWAY.
M. G. BULKELEY.

Mr. FORAKER and Mr. BULKELEY, in addition to the conclusions set forth in the foregoing minority report, make also the following finding, namely:

The weight of the testimony shows that none of the soldiers of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry participated in the shooting affray that occurred at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906.

J. B. FORAKER.
M. G. BULKELEY.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I ask leave of the Senate to make a further minority report, if it is in order to call it such. The report I ask leave to make is an expression of the individual views of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BULKELEY] and myself. From the report that has just been read it appears that we make a finding that our colleagues of the minority did not join us in making; and the report I ask leave to make, I repeat, is an expression of our views of the testimony and the reasons whereby we support not only the findings of the minority report, but the additional finding as to which we are agreed. I suppose the leave I ask will be granted as a matter of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report referred to by the Senator from Ohio will be received.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if the Senate will indulge me for a moment, I ask to give an excuse for not following the precedents which have been established here this morning of having these reports read. It would take too long to read this report. This report is not a generalization, not a mere statement of conclusions, but it is a review of the testimony, and an extended review of the testimony. As the majority report has shown, there are over 6,000 printed pages of this record, and it is impossible to do justice in the form of a report to such an investigation and such a mass of testimony in three or four pages of typewritten matter. Our report would require more than an hour, perhaps, to read, and I shall not, under the circumstances, ask the indulgence of the Senate to have it now read; but at an early day I shall take occasion to explain this report to the Senate and undertake to satisfy the Senate that there is not a finding in this report which is not justified by the testimony, and overwhelmingly justified by the testimony.

Mr. President, this report has already been printed, but there are some corrections in it, and so I will ask to have it printed again. I now ask that the Secretary read, not the report, but from the recapitulation as indicated near the close of the report down to the point I have marked. That will take only a few minutes. I also ask, Mr. President, that the entire report be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Ohio, in the absence of objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the President's message, the majority and minority reports, and the supplemental report all be printed as a document, so that we can get the whole thing in a handy shape.

Mr. LODGE. All the reports?

Mr. TILLMAN. All of them, and the message, too. Let that lead the procession.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina requests that the President's message and the majority and minority reports——

Mr. TILLMAN. Put in also, either behind or before—it does not matter where it comes in—the order discharging these men. Let us have a full record and report.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from South Carolina does not mean to include the volumes of testimony?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, not the evidence. I simply want all the conclusions of the committee, with the action of the President in discharging these men, the reasons given therein, and then his message to-day taking it all back.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I assume, since this report does not come from the committee accompanied by a bill, that it will not go to the Calendar, but may be printed as a committee report and lie on the table. Now, I ask the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] if he wishes to have it printed also as a miscellaneous document and have all these reports and the President's message included in one document?

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course. I want the entire case as it is at present made up to be in handy shape, so that it can be sent over the country for the benefit of the negroes North and South.

Mr. WARREN. Then I ask that these documents may be printed in the usual way as a report from the committee, and also that there may be printed in one pamphlet the President's message and the three reports—not, of course, the 6,000 pages of testimony, but all the balance—in a miscellaneous document.

Mr. FORAKER. Including the report of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Wyoming to include the order of discharge in this document that is to be printed?

Mr. WARREN. The order of discharge may be included.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want that in.

Mr. FORAKER. The order of discharge, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, is incorporated in the report I have made, just now filed. It is set out in that report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. FORAKER. I should like now to have the recapitulation of the report submitted by the Senator from Connecticut and myself read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will first put the request for printing. It is requested that the President's message and the reports made by the members of the Military Affairs Committee be printed in the ordinary manner, and also as a public document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will now read as requested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

The Secretary read the "recapitulation" of the supplemental report submitted by Mr. FORAKER and Mr. BULKELEY.

The entire report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. —.]

THE BROWNSVILLE AFFRAY.

The Committee on Military Affairs having completed the investigation authorized by the following resolution (S. Res. 208, 59th Cong., 2d sess., January 21, 1907):

"Resolved, That, without questioning the legality or justice of any act of the President in relation thereto, the Committee on Military Affairs is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to take and have printed testimony for the purpose of ascertaining all the facts with reference to or connected with the affray at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906. Said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to sit during sessions or recess of the Senate, and, if deemed advisable, at Brownsville or elsewhere; the expenses of the investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate"—

Mr. FORAKER, with leave of the committee and the Senate, on behalf of Mr. BULKELEY and himself, submitted the following report of their views of the testimony in support of the conclusions reached by them:

I. THE AFFRAY.

On the night of Monday, August 13, 1906, commencing about eight or ten minutes before midnight, a shooting affray occurred in the town of Brownsville, Tex., in the course of which one man, a private citizen by the name of Frank Natus, employed at the time as a barkeeper in the Ruby saloon, otherwise known as "Tillman's saloon," was killed, and the lieutenant of police, M. Y. Dominguez, was wounded and had his horse shot under him, and another citizen by the name of Paulino S. Preciado, the editor of a newspaper called "El Porvenir," published in Brownsville, in the Spanish language, claimed to have been slightly injured by a bullet grazing the back of his hand and passing through his clothing, striking and injuring a pair of spectacles he carried in his pocket.

OFFICERS OF BATTALION.

Companies B, C, and D of the First Battalion of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, colored, were at the time stationed at Fort Brown.

The commanding officer of the battalion and the post was Maj. Charles W. Penrose.

The companies were respectively commanded as follows: B Company, by Second Lieut. George C. Lawrason; C Company, by Capt. E. A. Macklin; D Company, by Capt. Samuel P. Lyon; Lieut. Harry S. Grier was quartermaster and commissary of the post, and also acting adjutant.

Major Penrose, Lieutenant Lawrason, and Lieutenant Grier were all graduates of West Point; Major Penrose of the class of 1884, Lieutenant Grier of the class of 1899, Lieutenant Lawrason of the class of 1904.

Captain Macklin was appointed from civil life in 1892. He has been in the service fifteen years, and been a commissioned officer since July 9, 1898. Captain Lyon entered the service as an enlisted man in 1890, and was promoted to the rank of a commissioned officer in 1895.

These officers had therefore, respectively, been in the service: Major Penrose, for twenty-seven years, including four years at the Academy; Captain Lyon, seventeen years; Captain Macklin, fifteen years; Lieutenant Grier, twelve years, including four years at the Academy; Lieutenant Lawrason, seven years, including four years at the Academy.

The testimony shows that the record of each down to the time of this shooting affray was without any kind of stain or blemish, and that all these officers were of high character not only as officers of the Army, but as men; that they were honorable, upright, truthful, and trustworthy in every sense of the word.

ENLISTED MEN OF THE BATTALION.

The testimony further shows that these three companies had, to quote the exact language of Major Blocksom, "an excellent reputation up to the 13th of August," the date of the shooting.

This statement of Major Blocksom is confirmed by even stronger and more elaborate statements by every witness familiar with the record of these companies who testified on the subject.

There will be found in the record official reports from the War Department of two or three shooting affrays and difficulties of one kind and another occurring during the forty years of service since the regiment was organized with which other companies of the Twenty-fifth Infantry were identified, or in which they had some kind of participation, or to which they had some kind of relation, or for which they had some sort of responsibility, but, so far as these three companies which were at Brownsville are concerned, there is no stain whatever on the record of any one of them. No company in all the Army had any clearer or better record for discipline and for the general conduct of the men belonging to it than had each and all of these companies down to August 13, 1906.

Almost all the men in these companies had served more than one enlistment. Their respective terms of service ranged in duration all the way from five or six years up to more than twenty years. One of them, Sergt. Mingo Sanders, of Company B, had served continuously for twenty-six years; a part of that service had been outside of the United States, and for that reason he was entitled to double time therefor, on account of which he would have been entitled after eighteen months of additional service to retire on three-quarters pay and with all the rights and allowances provided by law for men who serve continuously for thirty years.

The following extracts from the evidence given by the different witnesses named show the exceptionally high character of the men of these three companies and their good record as soldiers:

Major Penrose says, as to the character of men (page 3023):

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Now, something was said by Captain Kelly (a citizen of Brownsville) and some others about your troops being not well disciplined. Can you tell us what the record of your battalion is in that respect, down to the 13th of August?—A. I think the records will show, sir, that it was an excellently disciplined battalion.

"Q. And well drilled?—A. Well drilled. I consider it one of the best that I have ever seen.

"Q. Were the men of a character hard to get along with or otherwise?—A. No, sir; they were very easy to discipline.

"Q. As a rule, deported themselves well?—A. As a rule, they behaved themselves very well. That can be borne out by the records of the post, the summary court record, the records of courts-martial, and also, I think, by any officers who have seen them, either before this occurrence or afterwards.

"Q. Now, afterwards, since August 13, and particularly since they have been discharged, what has been their records, in so far as you know, as to deporting themselves properly?—A. So far as I know, their record has been excellent. I know at the time of their discharge, when we were discharging them at Fort Reno, I was in constant communication with the chief of police at El Reno, the town 5 miles distant, and he told me that he did not see a drunken man nor did he have any disorder among those men of any kind. He told me that he would not know that the men were being discharged at all.

"By Senator HEMENWAY:

"Q. Do you know Captain Kelly?—A. Capt. William Kelly?

"Q. Yes.—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You heard his statement, or heard of his statement, before this committee that he would be as quick to believe the colored soldiers as he would the Mexican residents, barring a few of the leading families, did you, and that he would not care to believe either?—A. Yes, sir; I have heard that he made such a statement.

"Q. How many men in your battalion had been under fire, either in battles or in skirmishes?—A. Well, I do not know that I could answer that positively at all, Senator, but as a rough estimate I should think that there probably were 30 per cent of them, maybe 40 per cent of them.

"Q. From your knowledge of these men, their bravery in battle, following the flag of their country, and their general behavior, would you believe them on oath?—A. I would, sir.

"Q. You think their evidence should be given the same weight as that of any other American citizen?—A. I do, sir.

"Q. You think it equally as good as the testimony of the Mexican residents of Brownsville?—A. Yes, sir; I do."

Brig. Gen. Andrew S. Burt (retired 1902) was commander as colonel of the Twenty-fifth Infantry for about ten years. As to character of men he says (pp. 3189, 3190, 3191, 3192, 3193, and 3195):

"Q. Give the stenographer your full name, General, and your present position.—A. Andrew S. Burt, brigadier-general, United States Army, retired, Washington, D. C.

"Q. What time did you retire?—A. In 1902; in May of that year.

"Q. What regiment were you in command of when you were promoted to a brigadier-general?—A. The Twenty-fifth Infantry.

"Q. How long had you been commander of it?—A. For about ten years, excepting the time I was brigadier-general of volunteers, during the Spanish-American war. That was a very short time, only a few months. I joined it in 1892, and was mustered out, or rather promoted to brigadier-general, retired, in 1902. It was about ten years.

"Q. General, the question has come up before the committee as to the character of some of the men of the battalion which was dismissed from the service without honor last year. I will name over some of the men in that battalion, and as I name them I would like you to give me your opinion as to their reliability and their truth; whether they could be trusted or their word taken. The first man I find here is this man Sanders—Mingo Sanders.—A. Sergt. Mingo Sanders?

"Q. Yes.—A. I know him very well, sir. He served with me. There is no better first sergeant in the United States Army than Sergt. Mingo Sanders. His veracity, as he sees a thing, is beyond question.

"Q. How about Sergeant McCurdy? Do you remember him?—A. McCurdy is a good man and a trustworthy man. I do not know him as well as I do Sanders.

* * * * * * *

"I can say in general terms that those men are all to be believed on their oath. I would believe them if I were sitting on a court-martial and they were even called in their own defense."

Captain Macklin says (pp. 1788–1789):

"Q. What was the character of the men who constituted that battalion, speaking in a general way? Were they a peaceable, orderly, well-behaved set of soldiers or not?—A. They were, sir; those reports in these books to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Q. Had this battalion or any company of it or any men in it had special trouble during all the time you were connected with it?—A. Never; no, sir. There were individual fights, you understand, sir.

"Q. They would fight one another?—A. Among themselves, sir, over drinking or something of that kind, but no other disturbances.

"Q. State whether or not they did any drinking to excess as compared with other soldiers.—A. No; they did not. I have commanded white soldiers a good deal, and I found that the drinking among our men was much less.

"Q. Drinking among the colored soldiers was less than among the white soldiers?—A. Yes, sir; very much.

"Q. You would get through pay day with fewer arrests?—A. Well, sir, they were through that pay day at Brownsville and there was only one single arrest in town.

"Q. In the whole battalion?—A. In the whole battalion. There was not an arrest in the post at all."

Capt. Samuel P. Lyon says (pp. 1836–1838):

"Q. So that you have had a good deal of experience, not only with these men, but with other commands. I want to ask you how, in your opinion, this battalion, Companies B, C, and D, compared as soldiers with other soldiers of the United States Army?—A. In my opinion they would compare most favorably.

"Q. Was it or not a battalion that was well disciplined and well drilled?—A. Yes, sir; the drill and discipline were excellent. I never saw better.

"Q. As to the conduct of the men generally as men, what is your opinion as to that?—A. It was, in my opinion, exceptionally good.

"Q. I want to ask you particularly as to the older men in service in that battalion, particularly the noncommissioned officers. What kind of men were they?—A. They were a most excellent lot of men, and an excellent lot of noncommissioned officers."

CONDUCT OF MEN AT BROWNSVILLE.

This battalion had been, together with other companies of the regiment, stationed at Fort Niobrara, Nebr., for two or three years immediately prior to their going to Brownsville, and prior to that they had served in the Philippines, in Cuba, on the frontier, and elsewhere. They arrived at Fort Brown on Saturday, the 28th of July, 1906. They had been there only two weeks and two days when this shooting occurred. There is practically no conflict in the testimony as to their conduct at Brownsville. The great preponderance is in accord with the statement made by Victoriano Fernandez, a member of the police force of Brownsville, who testified in part as follows (pp. 2257–2258):

"By Senator SCOTT:

"Q. Witness (Victoriano Fernandez, policeman), do you know any reason why these soldiers would have any spite against the citizens of Brownsville, to want to shoot up the town and kill people?—A. No, sir; I don't know anything about it.

"Q. And you never heard them threaten anybody who was in the barracks, did you?—A. No, sir; oh, no. They used to treat everybody right there.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. They were very well-behaved people, were they not?—A. Yes, sir; very orderly, and I never saw one drunk.

"Q. You never saw one drunk, and you were on this Elizabeth street beat?—A. Always; yes, sir.

"Q. Every day?—A. Every day and sometimes part of the night.

"Q. And you never saw one of them drunk?—A. No, sir.

"Q. During the whole time?—A. No, sir.

"Q. It was your business to watch?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Do you remember when they had pay day?—A. Yes, sir; it was the quietest day I ever saw.

"Q. It was very different when the white soldiers were there?—A. Yes, sir; the white soldiers used to know lots of people and just have a little fun, but it didn't amount to nothing.

"Q. The white soldiers, when they had pay day, would go and spend a good deal of their money in saloons?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. But the colored soldiers were much better in that respect?—A. Yes, sir; they used to go to the saloon and have drinks in the back there, and they never said a word and would go out.

"Q. They were fine, orderly looking soldiers?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Good discipline?—A. Yes, sir; good soldiers. Good discipline, too.

"Q. Favorably with the Twenty-sixth Infantry, the white regiment there just ahead of them?—A. Well, of course I don't know nothing about——

"Q. Or any other regiment.

"Senator WARREN. Let him answer.

"A. But they were all right. To my knowledge I think they were better than the white soldiers—that is, on discipline.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Better in discipline?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. If anything, they were a good deal better in their habits, apparently?—A. Well, two or three months they were there; yes.

"Q. You never saw one of them drunk all the time you were there?—A. No, sir.

"Q. You were in a situation where you could have known about it if they had been drunk, were you?—A. Certainly.

"Q. Or disorderly?—A. Certainly.

"Q. You never arrested one?—A. No, sir."

TROUBLES AT BROWNSVILLE.

When they went to Brownsville they relieved a battalion of the Twenty-sixth United States Infantry, white soldiers, which had been stationed there for about one and one-half years.

Although the battalion did not reach Brownsville until the 28th of July, it was announced in the newspapers as early as the latter part of May, 1906, that it was to be sent there. There is some conflict in the testimony as to the feeling of the citizens of Brownsville toward negro soldiers, but the overwhelming weight of testimony is to the effect, as stated by Major Blocksom in his official report, found at page 61 of Senate Document 155, part 1:

"2. The people did not desire the colored troops and thought they should not be sent there. I learned this * * * from prominent citizens, members of the committee of safety, etc."

Major Blocksom further finds, page 61, Senate Document 155, part 1:

"3. Soldiers of the Twenty-fifth were not allowed to drink with white people at the principal bars in town, though in some cases saloon keepers put up a separate bar for their use."

The testimony shows that in many of these saloons, particularly those kept by Mexicans, there was no such discrimination.

There is no proof that the soldiers showed any resentment on account of this regulation debarring them from the saloons by either words or conduct. In so far as there is any testimony on the subject, it is all to the effect that they observed the regulations without any complaint and without showing any resentment whatever on that account. The testimony further shows that they frequented such saloons as they were at liberty to visit but very little, and that on Saturday, August 11, two days before the shooting affray occurred, one of their number, William Allison by name, was discharged on account of the expiration of his term of service, and that he at once opened a saloon for their special accommodation, which they all patronized, spending their money there with their discharged comrade instead of in the saloons kept by the citizens of Brownsville.

During their short stay there were three altercations between the citizens and the soldiers, but only two of them were of serious enough character to really merit mention.

Major Blocksom (p. 61, S. Doc. 155) refers to these cases as follows:

"4. Tate-Newton, Baker-Reed cases, etc. (see B and B'' '). Tate-Newton case was that of a party of ladies standing on street side, sidewalk, claimed that two colored soldiers rudely jostled them. Mr. Tate, inspector of customs, husband of one of the ladies, knocked down one of the soldiers with his revolver. The ladies were obstructing the sidewalk, although anybody could have easily gotten by them. The soldier was rude and probably insulting in his manner. Tate's remedy was too drastic. It was "in the manner of the South." He told me he would have used it against any man, white or black. Mr. Vann, collector of customs, invited Major Penrose to assist at an investigation of this case, but latter had no time after the 13th. Reed and another colored soldier were at ferry landing, having returned from Matamoras. Mr. Baker, inspector of customs, claimed they were drunk and disorderly (confirmed by an unprejudiced witness); that he told them to move on, and finally pushed one, who fell off plank walk into mud and water about knee-deep, more through his condition than strength of the push. Baker probably used more force than he acknowledged. Facts in these two cases were exaggerated on both sides and increased the bitter feeling between soldiers and citizens. I heard of several cases of threats from both sides before the 13th, but believe them manufactured."

THE EVANS AFFAIR.

In addition it was claimed that the night before the shooting a soldier assaulted a Mrs. Evans and that the people of Brownsville were greatly incensed toward the soldiers on that account, but no testimony has been adduced to prove such assault, and if there had been it would only constitute a reason why the citizens might attack the soldiers and not a reason why the soldiers should attack the citizens. It is not necessary, therefore, to give the matter special consideration in this connection.

There is positive conflict and contradiction as to the facts connected with the other difficulties, but the testimony most unfavorable to the soldiers does not make the cases worse for the soldiers than the statement of Major Blocksom, while, according to the testimony of the soldiers, the assault upon Newton was unprovoked and without any excuse whatever.

THE NEWTON CASE.

Private Newton testified on this point, at page 2959, as follows:

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. It has been testified here that there was some trouble in Brownsville between a man by the name of Tate and a soldier by the name of Newton who belonged to Company C. Are you the soldier?—A. Yes, sir; I am.

"Q. Please describe to us what occurred. Tell us all about it in your own way. First, let me ask you when it was, if you can tell?—A. The 5th of August.

"Q. On the 5th day of August, 1906?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Do you remember what day of the week that was?—A. It was on a Sunday, if I am not mistaken.

"Q. About what time was it—what o'clock?—A. Between 8 and 9 o'clock, as nearly as I can recollect it.

"Q. In the evening?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was it before or after dark?—A. After dark, sir.

"Q. Well, now, where did it happen?—A. It happened below the post-office, sir; in that section.

"Q. Can you tell us on what street the post-office is situated?—A. I don't know but one street; I think it is Elizabeth street. That is the only street I know there.

"Q. Is it situated on the street that leads out from the gate of the garrison?—A. I think it is, sir.

"Q. At your left is a map hanging on the wall [referring to the map]. This is the reservation. Here are the barracks. That is Elizabeth street.—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Here is D barracks, and B barracks, and C barracks, and the unoccupied barracks.—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. The guardhouse up here, the hospital over here, the officers' quarters over here, and the administration building here. Now, where is the post-office? Is it on this street that you enter when you go out at the gate and proceed in a straight direction?—A. Yes, sir; I think that is the street it is on, sir.

"Q. Do you think it is. Well, about how far from the garrison is the post-office situated, if you can tell?—A. I think it is three or four blocks, more or less, sir.

"Q. You don't know exactly?—A. No, sir.

"Q. You were not familiar with the streets there?—A. No, sir.

"Q. How long had you been at Brownsville?—A. I had been there ever since my battalion arrived there.

"Q. Only about a week prior to this time, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. The testimony is that you arrived there on the 28th of July?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And this was the 5th of August?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Had you been around through the town any, up to that time?—A. I think I had taken a walk about three times.

"Q. Had you become familiar with the streets?—A. No, sir; not very.

"Q. Or with the location of the buildings?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Well, this was Sunday evening, August 5, between 8 and 9 o'clock. Where were you going and were you in company with anybody; and if so, with whom?—A. With Private Frank J. Lipscomb.

"Q. Was he of that same company?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Where were you going?—A. We were taking a walk, and had been by the post-office, sir.

"Q. You had been by the post-office?—A. Yes, sir; and on the way from there up the street.

"Q. And you were beyond the post-office, were you, going from the garrison?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Were you armed?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Neither of you?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you have any kind of weapon?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Were either of you drunk?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Had either of you been drinking?—A. No, sir.

"Q. It was Sunday evening. Well, now, what occurred? Just tell that in your own way.—A. As we passed beyond the post-office here, there was a party of ladies standing on the sidewalk, and they were standing in such a position that we had to walk by file in order to pass them, and as I passed them I said something to Frank—I have forgotten what it was—and when I looked around this way again, why, some one had drawn back, and as I turned that way he struck me with a revolver and knocked me down.

"Q. Did you pass through that crowd of ladies?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Standing on the sidewalk?—A. No, sir; between them and the fence.

"Q. You went between them and the fence?—A. Yes, sir; they standing around to my left—to our left—and we had to walk by file in order to keep from pushing against them.

"Q. Were you going from the post still?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. On which side of the street were you—the right-hand side as you went out?—A. The right-hand side; yes, sir.

"Q. And the ladies were standing on the sidewalk?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And there was a space to the right between them and the fence?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Between the sidewalk and the fence?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And when you came up you say you stepped off toward the fence and passed around in single file?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you strike any lady?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Or jostle any lady?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Or touch any lady?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you try to go through the crowd of ladies?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you speak to any of the ladies?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you speak to anybody?—A. No one at all, only my comrade who was with me, sir.

"Q. Did you know the man was going to strike you until he did so?—A. No, sir.

"Q. What was it he struck you with?—A. It was a revolver, sir.

"Q. And what effect did it have on you?—A. It knocked me insensible for a few seconds.

"Q. You fell?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Then what did you do?—A. After I came to myself he was covering me with his revolver, and he told me to get up and leave."

He is confirmed in all he says by his comrade, Private Lipscomb, who was with him.

NEWTON'S CHARACTER.

Captain Macklin says of Newton:

"* * * He was not incensed or angry, but he felt hurt. Newton was a splendid soldier, a man of good habits, and I do not believe, knowing the man, that he would deliberately pass any people on the sidewalk, white or colored, and brush against them or knock them off. He was my company clerk for a long time, and was extremely polite and obedient." (Penrose Court-Martial, p. 543.)

Captain Macklin was further interrogated about the Newton trouble (p. 1784, Senate committee), as follows:

"Q. Did you investigate it sufficiently to find out whether or not he pushed his way through among the ladies, jostling them as he did so?—A. I investigated the matter as far as I could with Privates Lipscomb and Newton. They were both very reliable men and very quiet soldiers, very inoffensive in their manner and everything, and I tried to find out and did find out who the man was that struck Newton, and also made a report to the commanding officer, and the commanding officer said that he would make a report to the collector of customs, a Mr. Van. I went down and got Mr. Van's name, and I also found out from the cashier of one of the banks in town the name of the man that struck Newton. It seemed that he had bragged about it in town, and the cashier had a little hesitancy in telling me his name, but finally gave it to me. I gave his name to the commanding officer, and the commanding officer said he would make a complaint and go down and see Mr. Van, but Mr. Van was out of the city.

"Q. It has been testified here that Newton was a quarrelsome man and was in the habit of getting drunk and getting into trouble. Is that true or not?—A. No; it is not. He was my company clerk for about a year and I came into intimate contact with him every day.

"Q. Was his conduct that of a good man as well as a good soldier or not?—A. Yes, sir; it was. I would be glad to have him back any time. He was the kind of a man that any captain would like to have in his company.

"Q. A truthful, reliable man?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Would you believe his statement?—A. Yes, sir; I would.

"Q. Do you know of anything at all in his character or in his record that would warrant you in distrusting a statement he would make under oath?—A. Not in any way; no, sir.

"Q. Was he or not a man who would be offensive, especially in a city like that, where there was, perhaps naturally, some prejudice against colored men, when he was passing white people as he was passing those people?—A. I do not think he would speak to anybody or offend anyone, Senator. He had a good deal of sense.

"Q. What kind of a man was Lipscomb, who was with him?—A. Lipscomb was very much the same kind of a man; very quiet and inoffensive, a man who very seldom spoke.

"Q. Where were they going when they got into this trouble?—A. They reported to me that they were simply taking a walk on Elizabeth street. The position they were in was somewhere out in the residence district. The walks were broad and it was the best street to walk on.

"Q. Did Newton report that he had any warning whatever that he was going to be struck with this revolver in this way?—A. No, sir. Do you want the report he made to me?

"Q. What did he say as to whether or not Mr. Tate gave him any warning whatever that he was going to strike him?—A. None whatever; no, sir.

"Q. Just as he came around by the ladies——A. Just as he got opposite to him he whipped out a revolver and hit him in the head with it.

"Q. Knocked him down, did he?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was he badly wounded or not?—A. No, sir; he did not seem to be. He seemed to be feeling bad, offended about it.

"Q. What did he say about it?—A. He said he thought as long as they were going along and both behaving themselves it was a very unjust thing, and I told him I would lay the whole matter before the commanding officer, Major Penrose, and that I was sure he would take the matter up. We did not know at that time who it was that hit him.

"Q. Did that seem to be satisfactory to him or not?—A. Yes, sir; entirely so. I talked to him the next day. He was not excited any more than anyone would be over a thing of that kind.

"Q. Did he show any revengeful disposition or make any remarks that indicated he would seek to revenge himself for this kind of treatment?—A. Not in the least; no, sir.

"Q. Was he a man who would, in your judgment, be likely, even though mistreated in the way he claimed, to hatch a conspiracy or organize it to go out and shoot up a whole town full of men, women, and children indiscriminately at midnight?—A. No, sir; he was not that kind of a man.

"Q. Was not that kind of a man at all?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you ever hear of his making any threats of revenge at all at any time before this firing?—A. No, sir. I talked with him several times about the thing, and I told him that Major Penrose and myself had taken the matter up, and we would try and have it fixed, and I also told him the name of the man.

"Q. Did that seem to be satisfactory?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He did not even know the name of the man?—A. No, sir; he did not know the name of the man."

Captain Macklin further testified, at page 3125, Senate committee—

"* * * A. Soon after I took command of my company—Company C of the Twenty-fifth Infantry—which was in December, 1904, I made Newton my company clerk. I always regarded him as a very trustworthy man and a man of very good character."

In addition to what Captain Macklin thus says as to the character of man Private Newton was, it was manifest to the committee before which he appeared, and where he was examined and cross-examined most exhaustively, that he was entirely too nonaggressive a man to have conceived such a scheme for the resentment of his wrongs as was involved in the charge of forming and executing such a conspiracy as must have been entered into if the shooting was done by the soldiers. Moreover, Newton testifies, and is supported in this by the testimony of Captain Macklin and others, that he did not know the name of the man who struck him, nor know anything about him—either who he was, or where he lived, or in what business he was engaged.

Captain Macklin describes in the following manner the other two difficulties. We quote his testimony in full to show their inadequacy and the extreme improbability, in view of the character of the soldiers, that they furnished a motive for the affray. (Page 1785 et seq., Senate hearings.)

"Q. Others of your men had trouble also—one man by the name of Clifford Adair had some kind of trouble. Can you tell us what that was?—A. Adair came over from Matamoros and brought with him a little silver pen.

"Q. Was that a pen or a pin?—A. A pen.

"Q. I have seen it sometimes put down in the reports as a pin.—A. It was a penholder.

"Q. Something that he had bought at Matamoros?—A. He told me he paid a dollar Mex. for it, 50 cents gold, and he brought it over and had it in his pocket, and as soon as he came opposite the custom-house one of the officials there came out and stopped him and he said, 'Here, I will not allow any nigger to bring anything over here. You are smuggling; I am going to report you to your company commander.' He said, 'All right, go ahead and report it,' and he took the penholder away from him.

"Q. How did the custom-house officer know that he had this pen?—A. He searched him, sir.

"Q. Searched him and found it?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And then he used that language to him?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What was the rule or the custom as to exhibiting articles for inspection to the custom-house officer when they were not in packages?—A. Well, I really could not tell you, sir. I have not been over there but once. I was there once, and they never inspected officers at all; but I have understood that they never inspected for any small packages at all, and that that penholder was a nondutiable article.

"Q. What did that officer do about the pen? Did he leave it with Adair or did he take it away from him?—A. He took it away from him, and we have never seen it since.

"Q. He kept it, did he?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did he make any report to the officers about it?—A. Adair reported to me.

"Q. What was it?—A. He reported it to me on the morning of August 12—that was Sunday morning—and I told Adair that I would endeavor to get the penholder for him, but the affair came up on the 13th, and I was never allowed in town after that time. None of us were allowed in town.

"Q. Never got to investigate it?—A. No, sir; I never had any opportunity at all.

"Q. You did not have any opportunity to see the customs officer or take it away from him?—A. No, sir; he has the penholder yet. Adair told this man he was perfectly willing to pay the duty on it; and the man said: 'No; I am going to report you for trying to smuggle.'

"Q. How much did the man claim the duty was?—A. He did not claim there was any duty. He told Adair he would not let him pay it.

"Q. As a matter of fact, was there any duty on it?—A. I don't think so; no, sir. As a matter of fact, they brought in cigars and everything there.

"Q. What kind of a soldier was Clifford Adair?—A. Clifford Adair was an excellent soldier. He was what we call an 'orderly character,' very neat and clean; nearly always got orderly for the commanding officer when he went on guard.

"Q. Was he a quarrelsome man?—A. Not in the least; no, sir.

"Q. Or the reverse of it?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. A quiet, peaceable man?—A. Well, he talked a good deal, like a good many colored men do, but he was inoffensive, and a very neat, clean soldier.

"Q. Was he or not a man who was impertinent in his manner, or the reverse of that?—A. He was not impertinent; no, sir.

"Q. Was he a truthful man?—A. I have always found him so; yes, sir.

"Q. Now, there was one other trouble—Private Reed had some trouble. What was that, if you remember?—A. Private Reed was also returning from Matamoros, and he came along the board walk there and one of the custom-house men boosted him off the sidewalk into the river.

"Q. What were the facts about that, if you know?—A. I took the matter up and investigated it as far as I could with the other men, and had Reed in the next day, and he laughed and told me that he thought he had gotten just what he deserved.

"Q. He had been drinking, hadn't he?—A. Yes, sir; he had been drinking and was noisy, and he said he was perfectly satisfied to let the matter drop.

"Q. That was on Sunday evening, the 12th, was it not?—A. I think that was the night; yes, sir.

"Q. And it was the next day, the 13th, when he told you this?—A. Yes, sir; I investigated it the following morning.

"Q. Did he look as though he was busy at that time getting up a shooting party to shoot up the town?—A. No, sir; he was a happy, good-natured sort of a man.

"Q. He did not have any murderous instincts, as far as you were aware?—A. No, sir.

"Senator WARNER. Let me ask one question right there.

"Senator FORAKER. Certainly.

"By Senator WARNER:

"Q. Could you tell whether he had any such purpose? Could you tell from his looks whether he had any such purpose or not?—A. No, sir; I did not think so.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. There was nothing in his manner and nothing in his tone, and nothing in his language, as I understand you, to indicate that he was seriously offended even?—A. No, sir.

"Q. On the contrary, he said he got just about what he deserved?—A. Yes, sir; that is exactly what he told me. He laughed and told me those words.

"Q. Did not ask you to do anything further?—A. He said he thought he had better let the matter drop.

"Q. Were there any other troubles of any kind that your men got into there?—A. Those are the only ones that I recall at this time, sir. I don't think there were any others at all."

BROWNSVILLE.

The testimony shows that Brownsville has a population of from 6,000 to 8,000, and that it is perhaps five-sixths Mexican. It is situated on the Rio Grande River, immediately opposite Matamoros.

The testimony further shows that the town, like other frontier towns, has had its fair share, if not more, of one kind and another of violators of the law. Smuggling has been quite common. The testimony shows that there are some seven or eight mounted customs officers constantly on duty, looking out for smugglers at that point and up and down the river in that locality. One of these customs officers, Mr. Fred E. Starck, testified that in the nine years of his service he had made more than 600 arrests. Others, presumably, in so far as the testimony throws any light on the subject, had the same general experience.

The following testimony of Doctor Combe, the mayor, shows that the citizens were well supplied with firearms and ready to use them on short notice:

He says, at page 2405:

"Q. Are you reasonably familiar with the arms that are used [in Brownsville]? There are a good many people have guns, do they not?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You may state if you are reasonably acquainted with the kind or character of arms there.—A. Well, the most common weapon there is the .44 or .45 caliber Colt, so far as pistols are concerned. It is a hunting country, a cowboy country, and almost every family has arms."

* * * * * * *

He further testified, at page 2429, that "it was a very common thing for the citizens of Brownsville to carry arms; that he was the first man to enforce the law."

"Q. Was it not a very customary thing for men to be going about with pistols strapped to them?—A. Yes, sir; but you must remember that Brownsville is the only town in that vicinity, and these ranchmen coming in there for a number of miles around would ride into town with their six-shooters on.

"Q. I am not finding any fault, but it was the custom?—A. Yes, sir; but I was talking about concealed weapons.

"Q. Well, concealed weapons. Did not almost every man carry some kind of an arm?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Those that came in from the ranges would?—A. Oh, yes, sir.

"Q. They had a carbine or a pistol?—A. Or a pistol; yes, sir.

"Q. That was not an uncommon thing?—A. That was not an uncommon thing."

Before the Penrose court-martial he testified, at page 172, that immediately after the firing he found assembled in front of the Ruby saloon "the chief of police, and all of the policemen that had been called in from their beats, and quite a number of citizens armed with shotguns, pistols, and rifles and such weapons as they could get together. * * * The people were quite excited, and they addressed me especially to lead them down to the post;" but that he appealed to them and persuaded them to desist from such a purpose.

He made a similar statement before Mr. Purdy, reported at page 146 of the Purdy testimony, Senate Document No. 155, part 2.

Captain Lyon, at page 1856, Senate hearings, testified as to what Mayor Combe said to him that night—

"Q. Did the people seem to be excited?—A. They were quiet then, but Mayor Combe told me that he had just succeeded in dispersing a band of about 200 armed men who were headed toward the post."

The testimony also shows that the town had a full supply of saloons and that they were generously patronized by the citizens of the place and of that vicinity, and that in the conversation carried on in these drinking places before the arrival of the negro soldiers, after it was learned that they had been ordered there, and after their arrival, and before the shooting affray and subsequent thereto, many ugly expressions were employed, among them numerous threats of violence, coupled with such announcements as that "the negro soldiers would not stay long if they did come;" that "they would soon get rid of them," etc.

[Telegram.]

DALLAS, TEX., August 17, 1906.

SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Some time ago I called your attention to the danger of locating negro troops in Texas, especially at Brownsville. The recent outrageous conduct of such troops there fully justifies the fact of the people of that locality. Can not these troops be removed at once?

C. A. CULBERSON.

At page 165, same document, appears the following affidavit, made by Lieut. E. P. Thompson, Twenty-sixth United States Infantry:

SAN ANTONIO, COUNTY OF BEXAR,
The State of Texas, ss:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, one Edwin P. Thompson, who, being sworn, deposes and says:

"That he is a second lieutenant in the Army of the United States; that in such capacity he served at Fort Brown, Brownsville, Cameron County, State of Texas, from September 4, 1903, until August 13, 1906; that when it was known that a battalion of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry was to garrison the post many derogatory remarks were made before its arrival by some citizens in reference to the colored soldiers in words as follows, or words to the like effect: 'We don't want the damn niggers here;' 'Niggers will always cause trouble;' 'To hell with the colored soldiers; we want white men,' and that he is unable to fix any one of such remarks upon any one citizen owing to the frequency with which like remarks were made and the period of time covered; that various minor clashes occurred between the individual citizens of the town and the soldiers; that one Teofilo Crixell, a saloon keeper of Brownsville, Tex., told him that a row had occurred in the 'White Elephant' saloon, owned by one Vicente Crixell, in words to this effect, to wit: That one Bates, a Federal officer, was at the bar drinking when a colored soldier entered and asked for a drink; that the said Bates then turned to the soldier and said no nigger could drink at the same bar with him, and that upon the soldier remarking that he was as good as any white man, said Bates drew his revolver and hit the soldier over the head; said Bates then going to the police headquarters and offering to pay his own fine.

"Further deponent saith not.

"E. P. THOMPSON,
"Second Lieutenant, Twenty-sixth Infantry."

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 27th day of September, 1906.

L. M. PURCELL,
Second Lieutenant, Twenty-sixth Infantry, Judge-Advocate.

Hundreds of pages of additional testimony might be cited to the same effect.

On account of the story of the alleged assault on Mrs. Evans there was on Monday, the 13th of August, much excitement among the citizens, accompanied with expressions of a hostile and menacing character toward the soldiers.

The situation was such that Mayor Combe deemed it his duty to call at about 5 o'clock of the afternoon of the 13th of August upon Major Penrose, who had not heard the story, and told him about it and requested him to keep his men in quarters that night, on the ground that they might be harshly dealt with by the citizens if they should be found in the town.

His exact language was, as given in his own testimony, at page 2382:

"Major, this is a terrible affair. The people in town are very much incensed and excited, and I protest against any of your officers or men—I do not remember now whether I said 'officers,' but positively I said his men—'going into town to-night.' Then I made use of one or the other of these expressions, 'Major, if you allow those men to go into town to-night I will not be responsible for their lives,' or, 'Major, do not allow your men to go out of the post, because there is a great deal of danger in town.' One or the other of those expressions I used; I am not sure which."

While this testimony of Mayor Combe shows that the citizens were in a frame of mind to "shoot up" the soldiers, there is no testimony in connection with either that matter or any other to show that the soldiers ever thought of such a thing as "shooting up" the town.

On the contrary, the testimony shows, and shows conclusively, that in the Tate-Newton affair, where Newton was knocked down with a revolver, Newton made no resistance to Tate and made no threats of revenge and exhibited no special resentment; that Private Reed, who was pushed off the gang plank into the water, reported the matter to his captain, but laughingly remarked that he "guessed he got about what he deserved," or words to that effect, while the Adair matter was so trifling in character as to be hardly worthy of notice, yet the testimony shows with respect to it that the soldier was not at fault, and that he showed no resentment and made no threats against anybody.

Newton, Reed, and Adair all belonged to Company C, and are all satisfactorily accounted for and shown beyond any room for doubt not to have participated in any way in the shooting affray.

This, in connection with the breaking open of their gun racks, and the fact that they had no ammunition of the character indicated by the shells, bullets, and cartridges that were found the next morning at the places where the shooting occurred, would seem to make a conclusive showing that nobody belonging to Company C had any part in the shooting.

Not a man in either Company B or Company D had any trouble of any kind with anybody at Brownsville. There is not a word of testimony to indicate that anybody in either of these two companies had any reason for the slightest disposition to shoot up the town to revenge the wrongs, real or imaginary, of their comrades in Company C.

Hence there was an entire absence of motive for them or any of them to have engaged in such a raid.

THE FIRST SHOTS.

Major Penrose said:

"Q. Please tell us about the occurrences of the night of August 13–14, 1906, with reference to the shooting affray which occurred in Brownsville that night. Where were you when it commenced?—A. I was in my quarters, sir.

"Q. What time of night was it when it commenced, as nearly as you can tell?—A. It was soon after midnight, sir.

"Q. Had you retired for the night?—A. I had retired for the night.

"Q. Were you awake or asleep?—A. I was awake, sir.

"Q. Just proceed in your own way—though I may interrupt now and then—to tell us all you can recollect about what occurred that night—what you did, and what you saw, and what you ordered, and so forth and so on.—A. Yes, sir. I was awakened by two shots first.

"Q. You say you were awakened? I understood you to say you were awake.—A. I mean to say I was aroused—my attention was called—by two shots. I was not asleep, sir; I was awake. I had spoken to my wife only a moment before. The two shots were followed almost immediately by six or seven shots, fired very rapidly. Then there were three shots that stood out prominently, more so than the others, and that was immediately followed by a number of other shots fired irregularly. Some of them might have been attempts at volleys.

"Q. Now, let me interrupt you there to ask you where, as nearly as you could tell, were those first shots fired from?—A. The first shots were fired, as nearly as I could locate them, from some point between the vacant staff barracks and the guardhouse.

"Q. Inside or outside the reservation?—A. They were outside of the reservation, sir.

"Q. You were in your room at the time?—A. I was in my room at that time.

"Q. And in your bed at that time?—A. I jumped at once out of bed and commenced to dress. My wife said: 'What is that? Do you suppose it is a fire?' Almost instantly after that these several shots that I spoke of sounded.

"Q. Where did they seem to be fired from?—A. They seemed to me to be in the rear of C Company or B Company barracks, in that direction of the town.

"Q. Could you tell from where you were whether they were outside or inside the reservation?—A. I took them to be outside of the reservation, sir.

"Q. Can you tell us what kind of firearms those shots were fired from?—A. The first two shots I heard were undoubtedly pistol shots, sir, and I think they were fired with black powder. The other shots that I heard were from high-power guns undoubtedly.

"Q. By high-power guns, what kind of guns would be included in that term?—A. Well, sir, the Springfield rifle, such as we use in the Army now, is one; the Winchester, and all the sporting rifles.

"Q. The Krag?—A. The Krag is one of them; yes, sir.

"Q. The Savage?—A. The Savage and the Mannlicher.

"Q. The Marlin?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. The Mauser?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. They are all high-power rifles?—A. Yes, sir."

On this point Captain Lyon said:

"Q. How many shots did you hear at that time?—A. I heard two shots first.

"Q. Do you know whether or not they were the first shots fired?—A. I do not, sir; they were the first I heard.

"Q. They were the first you heard. About where were they fired from—about what location?—A. They were fired apparently from the road dividing the post from the town and over beyond the building No. 41, the commissary-sergeant's quarters; off in that direction somewhere. That is where they appeared to me.

"Q. That would be about opposite the guardhouse, you mean? I will ask Senator SCOTT to explain the map to you.—A. I think I understand it.

"Q. You do understand it? Can you indicate about where you think those first shots were?—A. In this general direction here [indicating on map].

"Q. Yes. You heard two shots?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Can you tell from what kind of a firearm they were fired?—A. Those shots were undoubtedly revolver shots; black powder.

"Q. What?—A. Black powder.

"Q. Black powder?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Those were the first you heard. Then what did you do?—A. After I heard those first two shots there were five or six shots fired at a few seconds' interval—that is, a few seconds after the first two—and they were also, in my mind, revolver shots. They were fired in rapid succession.

"Q. About where were they located?—A. I could not attempt to locate them definitely, but they were apparently down more in the direction of the quarters here; somewhere about here [indicating on map].

"Q. Some little time elapsed between the firing of the two shots and the firing of those others?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Then what did you next hear?—A. Almost immediately following those revolver shots there were a number of shots fired which, in my opinion, were fired from small-caliber high-power rifles.

"Q. When you say high-power rifles, what kind of rifles do you refer to?—A. The modern rifles of approximately .30 caliber, using a smokeless powder, and of high velocity, having a muzzle velocity of 1,700 feet or over.

"Q. How many rifles are there that might be described by the term 'high-power rifles?'—A. I do not think that I could name them all. The Winchester people make several patterns of high-power rifles. Then there is the Marlin, and the Savage, and the Ballard.

"Q. It might have been any of those kinds of rifles?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You do not mean, necessarily, when you say high-power rifles, the Springfield rifles?—A. No, sir.

"By Senator OVERMAN:

"Q. But it might have been the Springfield rifle?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. The Springfield is a high-power rifle?—A. Yes, sir."

Lieutenant Grier said (pp. 1689–1690):

"Q. What awakened you?—A. I was awakened by what I thought were two pistol shots.

"Q. Can you tell from where they seem to have been—the firing—at what location?—A. Yes; they seemed to be back over here in the rear of B Company barracks.

"Q. Outside or inside of the wall?—A. I could not state.

"Q. You were in the officers' quarters. Were you upstairs or downstairs?—A. Upstairs.

"Q. You only heard the sound coming from that general direction?—A. That is the idea.

"Q. It seemed to you to be somewhere over in the rear of B quarters?—A. Yes, sir."

George W. Rendall testified at pages 2039–2040 about the first shots, as follows:

"Q. Do you know anything about how many shots were fired before you got awake?—A. No, sir; I do not.

"Q. You do not?—A. No, sir.

"Q. All you know is that you were awakened by firing?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, what kind of shots were they?—A. I couldn't say.

"Q. Out of what kind of an arm were they fired?—A. I think they were pistols.

"Q. Yes; you have so testified, have you not, that they were pistol shots?—A. I don't know whether I have or not, but that was my impression at the time, that they were pistol shots, because they were so close together that it was peculiar, and I took more notice of it.

"Q. You testified before the citizens' committee, did you not?—A. No, sir; there was no testimony taken——

"Q. You made a statement, did you not?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you not state before the citizens' committee the following day after this occurrence, or within a day or two afterwards——A. Maybe so, sir.

"Q. (Continuing.) That these were pistol shots?—A. No, sir.

"Q. You did not?—A. No, sir; I do not think so.

"Q. We will see, after a while. Then you testified before Mr. Purdy?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you told him that these were pistol shots, did you not?—A. I told him that the shots that I saw the flashes from were pistol shots."

George W. Rendall, at pages 75–76 of Senate Document 155, is reported as testifying August 14, the day after the shooting affray occurred, before the citizens' committee, as follows:

"Well, I was sleeping about 10 o'clock and was woke up by pistol shots fired close to my house, about 60 feet from garrison, inside of garrison wall."

Later, December 6, 1906, he testified before the grand jury, and said:

"I was awakened by the shooting. There were two shots fired before I got up and looked out of the window. I judge they were pistol shots. The men I saw moving were inside the garrison wall, and the only shots that I saw as they left the weapons were pointed nearly upward."

Mayor Combe says (page 2383):

"Q. Now, proceed, Doctor, if you please. Just state where your home was.—A. My home was at the corner of Ninth and Elizabeth streets. I read for a while, and, as I said a few moments ago, retired about half past 11. I was sleeping on the back porch. I dozed off and was not very sound asleep when I heard what I thought to be four or five pistol shots in a southerly direction from my home."

On this same subject he testified on cross-examination, page 2415, as follows:

"Q. Now, what awakened you?—A. Sir?

"Q. Did you hear the first shots that were fired; did they awaken you?—A. I think I was awakened with the first shot.

"Q. And I understood you to say that you heard four or five shots in quick succession?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And that they were pistol shots?—A. I was so impressed.

"Q. They did not sound like the shots you heard later?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Which you describe as appearing to you to be from high-power guns?—A. No, sir."

He testifies as follows at page 2423:

"Q. Now, Mr. Mayor, these first shots you say were pistol shots? Where did they seem to you to be located?—A. In a southerly direction.

"Q. Down somewhere toward the barracks?—A. Yes, sir; south of my house some distance.

"Q. But you could not tell whether they were inside or outside of the wall?—A. No, sir.

"Q. You do not pretend to know anything about that?—A. No, sir.

"Q. You did not see any of the men who did the firing?—A. No, sir.

"Q. And all you know is that on account of this incident there was a very ugly feeling among the citizens, which caused you to request Major Penrose to keep his men in the fort that night?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And notwithstanding those precautions, about midnight you were awakened by this firing, and the first shots seemed to be from pistols?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What kind of pistols were those, if you can tell, .45-caliber pistols?—A. I should imagine it to have been a pistol of a similar character, possibly a .38, but not less than a .38 or a .44 or a .45.

"Q. You heard other pistol shots that night, also?—A. Yes, sir; I was wider awake then."

He also testified as follows at page 2440:

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. These first shots you think were fired by the policemen out of their pistols?—A. From what I have heard since I suppose it was Padron—just that one. I do not remember whether there were four or five shots——

"Q. I am speaking of the first you heard.—A. No; they were away down in the lower part of the town. The reports of the .45-caliber pistol I have spoken of, that I heard afterwards, were mixed up. There was volley firing, but I could hear the boom of the .45 in contradistinction to the sharp, quick sound of the other.

"Q. Mixed in with the rest of the shots?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. First one and then the other. As to the pistol shots, did you make any effort to find out who had fired those pistol shots?—A. Yes; I found out that Padron had.

"Q. Those were the first you heard?—A. Not the first; I heard four or five pistol shots immediately followed by the——

"Q. Did you find out who that was?—A. No, sir; we all supposed that that came from the garrison, afterwards. It was farther away, the last shots we heard.

"Q. What I am trying to get at is whether you made any effort to find out who fired those first four or five pistol shots?—A. None; except two or three days afterwards we were talking, and Mr. Rendall said he had heard pistol shots.

"Q. Did he say that he had heard pistol shots from the garrison?—A. He thought that he had heard pistol shots, or something of the kind, and I came to the conclusion that those shots were from the garrison.

"Q. And therefore you made no further examination?—A. No, sir; no further investigation."

LOCATION OF FIRST SHOTS.

There is much contradiction as to the location of the first firing that was heard. There were two men more able to give reliable information on this point than any others, and they were the sentinel on duty at the time very near to the point where the firing commenced, Private J. H. Howard, of Company D, and Matias Tamayo, a Mexican citizen of Brownsville. He was employed as scavenger for the reservation, and when the firing commenced was in the rear of B barracks near to the place where the first shots were fired. These men were both wide awake. They were in a situation to know accurately and definitely. Both have given intelligent, straightforward testimony.

Howard testifies that as soon as he heard the first fusillade of firing he passed between C and B barracks to a point near the walk in front of the barracks and held his piece in the air, fired it three times, each time calling the guard for the purpose of giving alarm. He testifies that there were no shots fired from within the walls of the reservation, except only these three shots fired by himself.

The scavenger testifies that after the first fusillade of shots he mounted his cart and rapidly drove away; that no shots were fired from within the reservation while he was in the rear of the barracks, but that all the first shots were fired from some place outside the reservation, somewhere in the neighborhood of the mouth of the Cowen alley.

Rendall testifies that the firing awakened him; that he at once went to his window, looked out over the reservation in the direction of D barracks; that while so looking he heard a shot to his left that caused him to turn and look to his left, and that he then saw two shots fired, as he thought, in the air. These were undoubtedly the shots fired by the sentinel. It is probable that others who claim that they saw shots fired from the barracks or from inside the reservation wall were misled in the same way. But, however that may be, the testimony of Howard and Tamayo is intelligent. It is based on actual knowledge and there is no excuse for not accepting and believing it except only upon the theory that these men deliberately committed perjury. So far as Howard is concerned, it might be claimed, if he were guilty or his comrades were, that he had a motive for committing perjury, namely, to shield himself and his comrades, but no such motive and no other kind of a motive for committing perjury can be ascribed to Tamayo. He was not a soldier. He practically had no acquaintances among the soldiers. He was a citizen of Brownsville. In so far as he is shown to have any interest whatever in the controversy it was an interest in favor of the community in which he lived rather than for the soldiers. He is not impeached in any way.

The following is the testimony of Tamayo and Howard on this point:

Testimony of Matias G. Tamayo.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Please give us your name in full.—A. Matias G. Tamayo.

"Q. Where do you reside?—A. Right now I reside at Fort Brown.

"Q. At Fort Brown?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Do you live in the fort or in the city of Brownsville?—A. I live in the fort.
"Q. You live in the fort?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. How are you occupied there, if at all?—A. Right now?
"Q. Yes.—A. Carpenter in Brownsville.
"Q. Carpenter?—A. Yes, sir; at Brownsville, Tex.
"Q. For the fort, do you mean?—A. No, sir; for Brownsville.
"Q. For Brownsville?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. That is, your business is the business of a carpenter?—A. Right now; yes, sir.
"Q. Are you employed in any way by the Government?—A. Yes, sir; I have been employed for six years by the Government as a scavenger.
"Q. I mean are you now?—A. No, sir.
"Q. You were the scavenger at Fort Brown, were you?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. And you held that place for six years?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Where were you born?—A. At Brownsville, Tex.
"Q. Lived there all your life?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. What nationality are you?—A. Mexican.
"Q. Wholly Mexican?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. A full-blooded Mexican?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Your father and mother?—A. Both Mexicans.
"Q. They live there in Brownsville, do they?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Did they ever live in Mexico?—A. Yes, sir; I believe my father and mother were born in Mexico.
"Q. Both across the river somewhere in Mexico?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. And you are how old, did you say?—A. Thirty years old.
"Q. Then, as long ago as six years, when you were 24, you became scavenger for the fort?—A. In 1900, the 30th of November.
"Q. Were you employed as scavenger at Fort Brown in August of last year?—A. No, sir; in November.
"Q. No; I mean were you scavenger in August of last year?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. At the time when there was a shooting affray?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Where were you at the time of that shooting affray, at Fort Brown?—A. I was inside of Fort Brown.
"Q. Were you engaged at that particular time, on that night, as scavenger?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Tell us where you were and what occurred, as nearly as you can.—A. I was back of B Company's kitchen, right at the corner of the barracks, while I heard the shooting at Brownsville. I heard two shoots, and then I heard all the rest of the shooting.
"Q. Now, at what time did you start on your rounds as scavenger? Did you go around every night?—A. Every night I had to go around between half-past 10 and 11 o'clock.
"Q. It was your business to go to the sinks?—A. To the sinks and ash cans.
"Q. To the ash cans, and so forth?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Where did you start from on that night?—A. I started from the quartermaster's corral and went to the post hospital.
"Q. Yes.—A. From the post hospital to the guardhouse, from the guardhouse to the laundry quarters, where I live now. I can show them to you.
"Senator OVERMAN. Do you understand the map there?
"The WITNESS. Yes, sir.
"Senator FORAKER. Where is the corral?
"(The map was here explained to the witness by Senator OVERMAN.)
"The WITNESS. The wagon shed—I think the corral is right here. Here is the corral right here [indicating].
"The CHAIRMAN. Right near the pump house.
"The WITNESS. This is the wagon shed right here [indicating].
"By Senator FORAKER:
"Q. What sort of a vehicle did you have to use in your duty as scavenger?—A. An iron cart.
"Q. With an iron bed, you mean, and an iron lid?—A. Yes, sir; and one mule.
"Q. One mule?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Where did you keep it in the daytime?—A. I used to keep it right outside here; right along here, outside this wall of the house here [indicating].
"Q. Did you do all your work in the nighttime?—A. Yes, sir; by myself.
"Q. By yourself. What time did you start that night from the corral on your work?—A. I started about a quarter to 11.
"Q. Tell us now where you went, indicating on the map.—A. I started right here and came along here and came to the post hospital [indicating].
"Senator FORAKER. The post hospital is down to the left there.
"Senator OVERMAN. Here is the hospital right here [indicating].
"The WITNESS. That is it; this place here [indicating].
"By Senator FORAKER:
"Q. And you were coming down to the hospital?—A. Down this road here, and then to here [indicating].
"Q. Did you have to stop at the hospital?—A. Yes, sir; I used to stop there about ten minutes.
"Q. Then where did you stop next?—A. I came along here [indicating].
"Q. What is the next building?—A. The guardhouse. Here is this road here [indicating].
"Q. The road is not marked; but there is a road running around in rear of the guardhouse?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. And you came on that road in rear of the guardhouse. Did you stop at the guardhouse?—A. Yes, sir; I stopped at the guardhouse.
"Q. Then where did you go?—A. I went to the laundry quarters; I believe it is here. That is marked on that. That is where the non-commissioned officers stop. I think this is where I live, right here [indicating]. They used to call them the laundry quarters. The commissary-sergeant lives opposite the ice plant.
"Q. We know that the map is not correct, so that we will not stop for that. You stopped at the laundry quarters; then where did you go from there?—A. To the company barracks, right here [indicating].
"(At this point Senator OVERMAN further explained the map to the witness.)
"By Senator FORAKER:
"Q. Now tell us how you came.—A. I worked here about ten minutes.
"Q. Wait a minute. Is there a road along the wall, between the wall and the barracks?—A. Yes, sir; right here [indicating].
"Q. There is a road here?—A. Right there; yes, sir.
"Q. Not shown on the map. All right.
"The WITNESS. From here I came to B barracks.
"Q. You stopped at B, then at C?—A. Right at the entrance to the barracks. I worked there for about ten minutes, and when I got through there I was feeling a little thirsty and I went in the company to get a drink of water, and I came out and jumped on my cart and drove about here, say [indicating].
"The CHAIRMAN. What time was that?
"The WITNESS. It was pretty near 12 o'clock when I drove to this place here.
"By Senator FORAKER:
"Q. What did you do after that time?—A. Right here I had an ash can to pick up.
"Q. An ash can?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. That was back of the kitchen?—A. Yes, sir; right here [indicating on map].
"Q. Did you stop?—A. I stopped right there and took hold of the ash can and emptied it on the cart.
"Q. That is, you got off your cart, or were you on the cart?—A. No, sir; I was off the cart.
"Q. Got down on the ground and picked up a can and emptied it?—A. Yes, sir; and then I set it on the ground. I heard the first shot.
"Q. Where was that fired from?—A. I think it was fired from right along this alley here [indicating on map].
"Q. What did you do after that?—A. I heard a lot of shooting.
"Q. Then what did you do?—A. I put my lantern out as soon as I heard the first two shots.
"Q. Then what did you do?—A. I stood for a little while facing the place where the firing was going on.
"Q. Yes.—A. And at the same time I could see the galleries, right here [indicating on map], and the place where the firing was taken place, right in front of me.
"Q. What was taking place?—A. The firing taking place.
"Q. You are not pointing to the town?—A. No, sir; I am not [pointing on the map].
"Q. The firing was in town?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Did you see any men moving about there before that first shot was fired?—A. No, sir.
"Q. Did you see any lights about the barracks?—A. No, sir.
"Q. Was there any noise about, anywhere?—A. No, sir; everything was quiet.
"Q. Everything was quiet?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Did you see any men moving about inside the wall near the sink of B Company?—A. No, sir.
"Q. Did you see anybody jump over the fence or the wall there in rear of B Company, opposite the mouth of Cowen alley?—A. No, sir.
"Q. Or at any other place?—A. No, sir.
"Q. If there had been any shots fired from the upper windows of B, C, and D barracks, were you in a situation to have seen them?—A. Yes, sir; I could very easily have seen them, because I could see the barracks here—around right here in front of me [indicating on map].
"Q. Now, were any shots fired from the barracks?—A. Not while I was there; no, sir.
"Q. How about the first shots?—A. I heard the first shots and then about 20 more shots, and then I drove off.
"Q. When they commenced shooting, then you left immediately?—A. I went away immediately.
"Q. With your cart?—A. Yes, sir. At the same time when I heard this first shot I heard a few bullets going into the post over the administration building.
"Q. That is important. Which way were they going?—A. They went up into the air.
"Q. Went up in the air?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Could you tell which way?—A. Across that way [indicating on map].
"Q. Across that way, you thought?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Then where did you go with your cart?—A. I went toward the administration building, but before I got to the administration building I stopped for a few seconds in front of this company, D [indicating on map].
"Q. That is D Company?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. How did you come to stop there?—A. I stopped there to see the men, because the first sound of the bugle had already gone.
"Q. What?—A. The first bugle.
"Q. You heard the first bugle; when was that?—A. As soon as I jumped from my cart I heard the first bugle call.
"Senator FOSTER. Where was that?
"The WITNESS. And right after that I heard all the bugles at the barracks.
"Q. When the firing commenced and the bugles commenced, what happened in the barracks?—A. Everybody commenced to get up.
"Q. Did they make any noise about it?—A. Yes sir; lots of noise."

Testimony of Joseph H. Howard (colored).

Joseph H. Howard (colored), after being first duly sworn, testified as follows:

"By Senator FORAKER:
"Q. Please state your full name.—A. Joseph Henry Howard.
"Q. Were you in August last a member of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. What company did you belong to?—A. Company D.
"Q. Who was the captain of that company?—A. Captain Lyon.
"Q. Were you with that company at Brownsville, Tex., in August last?—A. Yes, sir.
"Senator FORAKER. I will put in at this point the record of this soldier as furnished by the War Department, and found at page 271 of Senate Document No. 155.
"The record is as follows:

"'JOSEPH H. HOWARD.

"'Enlisted November 8, 1903; was discharged without honor as a private of Company D, Twenty-fifth Infantry, November 25, 1906.'

"By Senator FORAKER:
"Q. I observe by looking at this record that you were serving your first enlistment?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. This shows that you were enlisted November 8, 1903, and that you were discharged November 25, 1906, without honor, as a private of Company D. That is right, is it?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. In what State did you live before you enlisted?—A. Georgia.
"Q. Whereabouts in Georgia?—A. Columbus, Ga.
"Q. Where were you enlisted?—A. Phoenix, Ala.
"Q. Now, where were you on the night of August 13, when this shooting affray occurred in Brownsville?—A. I was on post in the rear of the soldiers' barracks.
"Q. You were on guard that night?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. As a detail from Company D?—A. Yes, sir.
"Q. And you were on post?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Tell us just what happened. Wait a moment until that map at your left is explained to you so that we can understand your testimony. That is a map of the fort and a part of Brownsville. Senator SCOTT will explain it to you.

"(Senator SCOTT pointed out to the witness the various localities as indicated on the map.)

"Q. What post were you on?—A. Post No. 2, sir.

"Q. Where is post No. 2?—A. In the rear of the soldiers' barracks.

"By Senator SCOTT:

"Q. In the rear or in front?—A. In the rear. It extends around the soldiers' barracks.

"Q. Clear around the barracks?—A. Yes, sir.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. That is, your beat extended all the way around?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In walking your beat, did you keep the barracks to your left or to your right?—A. To the left.

"Q. So that you walked up toward the guardhouse when you were in front of the barracks?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And down toward the gate and D barracks when you were in rear of the barracks?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How near were you to the wall?—A. I was right up by the side of the barracks when I was walking.

"Q. Your beat ran right along by the barracks, did it?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How far would you be from the wall when you were walking your beat in the rear of the barracks?—A. Just about 50 feet.

"Q. Now, you say you were on post at the time of this shooting. What time did you go on post that night?—A. Half past 10 o'clock.

"Q. Do you remember what relief you belonged to?—A. I think it was the first relief.

"Q. Who was the corporal of that relief, if you remember?—A. Corporal Wheeler.

"Q. You were in his relief?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Where were you when the firing commenced?—A. I was in the rear of the barracks, in the interval between B and C Companies' quarters.

"Q. What did you hear, and tell us as nearly as you can recollect all that occurred?—A. The first I heard was about two shots down the road.

"Q. Whereabouts; what road?—A. Down the road, right outside the gate, along the wall.

"By Senator OVERMAN:

"Q. Do you mean down toward the river, or the other way?—A. No, sir; they were away from the river, down toward the vacant staff barracks.

"Q. That is, you stood behind the wall near the gate, as I understood you. Now, do you mean near the gate or near the barracks?—A. Near the vacant staff barracks.

"Q. You heard two shots there?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Were they inside or outside the wall?—A. They were outside the wall.

"Q. Did you see anybody at all about the barracks, up and about at that time?—A. No, sir; not at that present time.

"Q. Was there anybody moving about inside this wall behind the barracks at that time?—A. The post scavenger.

"Q. Who was that?—A. He is a Mexican. He is the post scavenger.

"Q. Is that Matias Tamayo?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He was post scavenger. Where was he?—A. He was at B Company's sink, over next to the wall.

"Q. Over next to the wall?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How do you know he was there?—A. Because as the firing began he got on his cart and drove off.

"Q. Had you seen him before the firing commenced?—A. No, sir.

"Q. When the firing commenced what attracted your attention to him?—A. By a wagon rolling off. I heard the noise of his horse and wagon.

"Q. Did it make a noise?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You saw him go away and knew who he was and what it was?—A. I knew it was the scavenger's cart.

"Q. Did he come in there or not every night at about that time to do that kind of work?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, you heard two shots. What occurred next?—A. Well, I stopped and looked in that direction—the way I heard the two shots—and then, about thirty seconds after that, I heard a fusillade of shots.

"Q. A fusillade of shots?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Where was the fusillade of shots, as nearly as you can locate it?—A. They were right over to the right of me, across the wall.

"Q. That is right behind what barracks?—A. Well, they were to the right of me. I was in the interval between B and C Companies' barracks, and the shooting seemed to be over in that little alley.

"Q. There is an alley there, is there?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And this fusillade seemed to be over about the mouth of that alley?—A. Up in the alley.

"Q. Up in the alley?—A. Yes, sir.

"Senator FOSTER. What alley does he refer to?

"Senator FORAKER. There is an alley between Washington street and Elizabeth street, immediately to his right, where he was posted, in the interval between C barracks and B barracks.

"Q. When you heard the fusillade what did you do?—A. I yelled the alarm.

"Q. Did you do that in accordance with instructions or not? Was that your duty under such circumstances?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What alarm did you yell—what did you do?—A. 'Guard No. 2.'

"Q. That is the regular call, is it?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What does that mean? When a man on post calls 'Guard 2,' what does that mean?—A. Well, sir, the corporal of the relief at the guardhouse is supposed to come to the sentinel's rescue.

"Q. So it was your duty to call out and the duty of the corporal at the guardhouse to come to your rescue?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Then what further did you do?—A. I think at that time the shooting was still going on, and I came around on the front side of the barracks.

"Q. How did you get on the front side of the barracks?—A. Came right through the interval between the barracks.

"Q. How far were you up in the interval?—A. I was right out on the parade ground, right in front of the barracks on the parade ground side.

"Q. What did you do when you got there?—A. Discharged my piece and called the guard three times.

"Q. You discharged your piece and called the guard and what?—A. Three times."

FORMATION OF COMPANIES.

The testimony of the officers and men alike is to the effect that the call to arms was sounded immediately after the first volley of shots was fired upon order of Major Penrose, and that in response to the firing and the call to arms the men in the barracks were aroused, the gun racks were opened, and they were formed on their respective company parade grounds. There was delay in the formation of Company C, because the noncommissioned officer in charge of quarters refused to open the gun racks until he could get an order therefor from some superior officer. On account of this delay Major Penrose ordered the gun racks broken open, and two of them were broken open by the men with the use of axes and other implements. This company was not formed until five or ten minutes after the firing ceased, but D and B Companies were formed, or at least forming, before the firing ceased.

The roll of B Company was called, the call ending at about the time the firing ceased.

Captain Lyon personally inspected his men—Company D—as they fell in line and under orders from Major Penrose immediately placed them behind the wall of the reservation, where the roll was called and every man found to be present or accounted for. The roll call of Company B showed the same result. As soon as Company C was formed and placed in position the men were verified with like result. The officers are all of the opinion that while it was possible that men engaged in the firing could have rejoined their companies before verification, yet all are of the opinion that no one did so join; and they are of this opinion because they failed to observe, as they think they would have done if such a thing had occurred, any such excitement or quick breathing or other evidence of participation in the shooting affray on the part of any of their men, such as they are confident would necessarily have been observable if they had participated in the shooting, and then, in such haste as must have been necessary, joined their respective companies.

CITIZENS' COMMITTEE.

The next day after the shooting, August 14, the citizens organized a committee and made an investigation to ascertain who had done the shooting. Before this committee a large number of citizens appeared and made statements. These statements were not under oath, but they were reported stenographically. At that time the occurrences of the night before were fresh in their minds and their statements were free from any character of restraint or improper influence, except only that they were under great excitement, and the committee proceeded and the witnesses testified, as the record shows, upon the assumption that the shooting had been done by the negro soldiers and that the only inquiry was which of the soldiers were the guilty parties.

In support of this statement that the committee proceeded upon the theory that the shooting was done by the soldiers and that the witnesses so testified, the following is quoted from the record:

"Herbert Elkins called to the stand:

"You know the object of this meeting. We know that this outrage was committed by negro soldiers. We want any information that will lead to a discovery of who did it." (Page 85, Senate Document No. 155.)

Other quotations might be made to the same general effect, but on this point there is practically no dispute.

No one of all the witnesses called before this citizens' committee could say more than that, hearing the firing, he had looked out into the darkness of a very dark night and seen a party of men who appeared to be uniformed and armed like the soldiers from the garrison, and who, on that account, were recognized as soldiers.

It seemed to Major Blocksom and other investigators so improbable that the citizens of Brownsville would thus shoot up their own town, and so natural that the soldiers would, that these statements were readily accepted as satisfactory and sufficient to show their guilt. That it was at least possible, if not probable, that the shooting was done by others than the soldiers might have occurred to the Major and his associate investigators if they had recalled the numerous occurrences of similar character that have happened in other towns.

The following from the newspapers of December 8, 1907, shows that the most unexpected occurrences of that nature are liable to happen in the best-regulated communities:

"NIGHT RIDERS'" WORK—TERRORIZE ENTIRE TOWN—DESTROY PROPERTY VALUED AT $200,000—"SHOOT UP" HOUSES.

"HOPKINSVILLE, KY., December 7, 1907.

"Five hundred 'night riders,' masked and heavily armed, marched into Hopkinsville early to-day and destroyed property valued at over $200,000, while citizens, in terror of their lives, feared even to open their windows. The police and fire departments, telephone and telegraph offices, and even the railroad stations, were in possession of a wild mob, shooting right and left, flames from burning buildings meanwhile lighting up the city and the surrounding country until it seemed that the whole town was ablaze.

"Windows in the front of business houses and banks on the main street of the city were shot out, and the entire front of the building of one newspaper which had been especially severe in its condemnations of the raids of the 'night riders,' and which was owned by the mayor of the city, was demolished.

"Only two men were injured, one being Lindsay Mitchell, a tobacco buyer, who was severely beaten with switches and clubs, and the other, a brakeman, who was shot in the back while trying to move his train from the path of the flames.

"The raid caught the city unawares, as for some time the depredations resulting from the tobacco war had been of a minor nature, and it was generally thought that in the 'dark district' at least the worst was over.

"The property destroyed was as follows: W. H. Tandy, independent tobacco warehouse building, owned by J. H. Latham; B. M. Woolridge, association warehouse; Tandy & Fairleigh, buyers, warehouse.

"As soon as the 'night riders' left town, a posse of about fifteen, headed by Major Bassett, of the local militia, and Deputy Sheriff Cravens, entered buggies and followed the trail. As soon as the posse could get near enough they opened fire on the fleeing mob, which returned the shots. It is believed none of the 'night riders' was hit. The members of the posse escaped injury. They were soon outdistanced by the fleeing men, and after chasing the marauders past Gracey, the officers returned home.

"News was later received from all parts of town indicating the spread of the raid of the riders. There was hardly a house in the business section of the city which did not suffer.

"Just why no damage was done by the 'night riders' to the Imperial or the American Snuff Company warehouses is not known. They probably contained more stock than any other house.

"At the intercession of citizens who were being guarded on a street corner the invaders during the raid allowed the fire department to leave their building to save property adjacent to the burning buildings. Had it not been that no wind was blowing, and that the firemen and citizens worked so well, the entire city might have been destroyed.

"The girls in the telephone office were forced by fifteen men to leave their switchboards until the mob was ready to depart from town.

"Governor Beckham to-night, at the request of Mayor Meacham and County Judge Breathitt, ordered the local company of Kentucky State Guards to report to the sheriff for indefinite duty during the 'night-riders' trouble, under command of Maj. E. B. Bassett. The local officials believe they will be able to offer protection to secure witnesses who can positively identify members of the party."

When such bloody wickedness can be caused by tobacco in Kentucky, what may not have been born of race prejudice in Texas?

ACTION OF THE CAMERON COUNTY GRAND JURY.

In addition to the investigation made by the citizens' committee and by the officers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, the whole case was presented to the grand jury for Cameron County, Tex., of which Brownsville is the county seat, at its September session, with the result that after three weeks of investigation (see report of General McCaskey, p. 107, Senate Doc. No. 155) they found there was no testimony on which to base an indictment of anybody.

The following is the official report of the action of the grand jury made by the presiding judge of that judicial district:

[Telegram.]

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., September 28, 1906.

MILITARY SECRETARY,
War Department, Washington, D. C.:

Following received:

BROWNSVILLE, TEX., September 27, 1906.

MILITARY SECRETARY, DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
San Antonio, Tex.:

Following letter received by me this date repeated for your information:

"DEAR ARCHER,
"First Lieutenant, Twenty-sixth United States Infantry,
"Commanding Fort Brown, Tex.:

"In compliance with my agreement with the United States military authorities I hereby promptly advise you that the grand jury of Cameron County, adjourned this day, have, after investigation, not indicted any of the following-named parties, held at Fort Sam Houston to await the action of the civil authorities, and they are therefore entitled to release: Sergt. W. A. Brawner, Company C, Twenty-fifth Infantry; Corpl. David Powell, Company B, Twenty-fifth Infantry; Sergt. George Jackson, Company B, Twenty-fifth Infantry; Private J. H. Howard, Company D, Twenty-fifth Infantry; Private James W. Newton, Company C, Twenty-fifth Infantry; Private Oscar W. Reed, Company C, Twenty-fifth Infantry; Corporal Madison, Company C, Twenty-fifth Infantry; Private James C. Gill, Company D, Twenty-fifth Infantry; Sergeant Reid, Corpl. Willie H. Miller, Private C. W. Askew, Company C, Twenty-fifth Infantry; Private John Holtman, Company B, Twenty-fifth Infantry.

"STANLEY WELCH,
"Judge Twenty-eighth Judicial District of Texas."
ARCHER, Commanding.

Request instructions as to disposition these men.

MCCASKEY, Brigadier-General.

They made this finding, notwithstanding the fact that the men named had been, on the 23d of August, arrested and placed in confinement on the charge of murder on account of having participated in the shooting or having been accessories thereto. William Allison, who had been discharged from Company B, August 11, and who had started a saloon for the special accommodation of the men of the battalion, was also arrested.

Sergeant Jackson was, on the night of the shooting, in charge of Company B quarters; Sergeant Brawner was in charge of Company C quarters; and Corporal Powell was in charge of Company D quarters; Sergeant Reid was sergeant of the guard on duty at the time of the shooting; Corporal Miller, of Company C, was absent in the town on pass at the time of the shooting; Corporal Madison was corporal of the guard on the night of the shooting; Private Howard was the sentinel on post between the barracks and the reservation wall at the time when the firing commenced; Private Newton was the soldier who was assaulted by Mr. Tate, the customs officer; Private Reed was the soldier who was pushed off the plank into the water by Customs Officer Baker; and Private Askew was thought to be the owner of a soldier's cap found in the streets on the morning after the shooting; and Private Hollomon, of C Company, was thought to be interested in some way in the Allison saloon.

It was thought by the authorities investigating the matter that these were clews that pointed toward these men. It was righly assumed that it would have been impossible for a conspiracy to have been organized, the guns to have been secured from the gun racks, and the shooting party to have gone out into the town and to have returned without the noncommissioned officers in charge of the quarters having some knowledge of the affair, without the sergeant and corporals of the guard having some knowledge, without the sentinel on duty having some knowledge; and it was thought, in the absence of any other motive, that the shooting must have had relation to the offenses committed against Private Newton and Private Reed, and that consequently they would have some knowledge.

Undoubtedly most of these men would of necessity have known something of the facts if the shooting had been done by soldiers, because of the relation they were in to the transaction, but, as already indicated, the grand jury found the testimony wholly insufficient to hold anyone, and they were all discharged. Except only this testimony, mere deduction from acknowledged facts, there has never at any time been any testimony submitted even tending to identify any one of the soldiers as guilty of participation in the affray, and this testimony was pronounced by the grand jury to be utterly insufficient for that purpose. No one will pretend that in all the 3,000 pages of testimony there has been one iota of evidence added to strengthen the case against these men or against any other individuals.

MEN CHARGED WITH GUILT.

The officers of the battalion supposed at the time of the shooting that it was done by the citizens. It never occurred to them that anybody connected with the battalion was engaged in it until Doctor Combe, the mayor of Brownsville, visited the fort that night, after the firing was all over, and to Major Penrose made the charge that his men were the guilty parties. Major Penrose was unable to believe that his men were guilty, and remained of that opinion until the following morning, when Mayor Combe brought to him certain exploded shells and cartridges and clips that had been picked up at the places where the shooting had been done, which, upon examination, proved to be cartridges and shells and clips such as were in use by the men of the battalion and such, as it was claimed, were not in the possession of anybody else at Brownsville or in that vicinity.

OPINION OF OFFICERS.

In the face of this testimony Major Penrose and the other officers of the battalion concluded that some of their men must have done the firing. They remained of this opinion until the investigation by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate was in progress. During that investigation, on account of certain testimony that had been taken, Major Penrose and all his officers became convinced that the men of the battalion had nothing whatever to do with the shooting. All of them so testified.

CHANGE OF OPINION OF OFFICERS.

Major Penrose testified as follows (pp. 3024, 3025, and 3026) as to change of opinion about guilt of men:

"By Senator OVERMAN:

"Q. But, Major, you made up your mind that your soldiers had done the shooting without hearing any testimony of the eyewitnesses as to the soldiers being seen?—A. Yes, sir. Mayor Combe, Captain Kelly, and all of the gentlemen of that committee had told me that different people at Brownsville had reported seeing those men.

"Q. But didn't you make up your mind that your men had done it when you saw that those were Army shells, that they were freshly fired, and you found no bullets through the quarters? Taking that into consideration, didn't you make up your mind then that your soldiers had done it?—A. Yes, sir; I did.

"Q. When those gentlemen told you that those men had been seen on the streets, did you not at that time remember the darkness of the night as distinctly as you do to-day?—A. Yes, sir; exactly.

"Q. Why did you believe it then and discredit it to-day?—A. Because I thought there might have been some lights that they might have seen them by which I did not know of at that time.

"Q. Do you not still concede that there may have been?—A. There may have been in the Cowen house; that is the only thing I know about any lights being seen.

"Senator HEMENWAY. I was going to suggest that Senator Pettus has put a question, and that the witness should be allowed to answer it.

"Senator OVERMAN. I thought he was through.

"By Senator PETTUS:

"Q. Will you please finish your answer to my question.—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I want to know fully what produced this change in your mind, in your opinion, as to who did that shooting?—A. I am trying to give it to you, Senator. There was another question or two asked of me, if you will remember.

"Q. I want you to explain it fully in your own way.—A. Yes, sir. Well, as I say, the darkness of this night and the finding of those shells—my opinion commenced to change at that time. Then there was the testimony that was produced before this committee as to the experiment that was made at the Frankford Arsenal, where they found that 11 shells were fired from one gun.

"Senator FORAKER. A Springfield?

"A. One Springfield rifle that had been locked up in the arms chest at Fort Niobrara and was not opened until the morning of the 14th of August. They claim that 11—I think it is 11—of those shells, or 11 shells, fired from that gun were found in the streets of Brownsville. Those shells were brought down from Fort Niobrara to Brownsville. They were open, on the back porch of B Company. They were open there several days, I don't remember how long. I can see no way in the world that those shells could have been fired in the streets of Brownsville. There is another thing: I think they were taken out there and put there. That is the reason that I have changed my opinion, sir.

"By Senator LODGE:

"Q. You think those shells were put all over the town in order to give the idea that the soldiers did the shooting?—A. I think certainly those 11 shells were, sir.

"Q. Well, but it is in testimony and, I think, uncontradicted, that shells were picked up at a great many points?—A. Yes, sir; so I understand.

"Q. Your idea is that they must have been put there, at all those points?—A. That is my idea of it, sir.

"By Senator OVERMAN:

"Q. Do you think those freshly fired shells that were found there at the mouth of the alley were brought down from Niobrara?—A. I think so now

"Q. And put there?—A. I believe they were, sir

"Q. Yet you say they were freshly fired?—A. They had the appearance to me. They had only been fired a month before.

"By Senator TALIAFERRO:

"Q. Who do you think brought them from Niobrara?—A. B Company brought them down.

"Q. Who do you think distributed them in the streets?—A. I don't know, sir, unless some of the people of Brownsville.

"Q. How did they get out of the custody of B Company?—A. They were open on the back porch of B Company, and were left there for several days, Senator—this box was. I think the testimony so shows here.

"Q. They were at least more accessible to the members of B Company than they were to the public at large?—A. Yes, sir; that would be very possible that they were.

"Senator SCOTT. I should like to hear the answer to Senator Pettus's question, if I can get it.

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Q. If you have anything further to say in answer to the question of the Senator from Alabama, you will, of course, proceed with it and make full answer.—A. I should state in connection with that that there was the behavior of the men before this shooting occurred. They had been an excellent lot of men. We had never had any trouble with them; they were well disciplined, well drilled, easy to handle. From the time that this shooting occurred none of them was permitted to leave Fort Brown at all. We took them up to Fort Reno, Okla., and there they were confined absolutely to the limits of the post—the post proper. They were not permitted to leave it under any circumstances. I gave them extra drills, extra guard, and had them working at fatigue whenever they were not drilling or on guard, the whole day long. Those men took all that without a murmur or a complaint of any kind. There were five of the men who disobeyed that order and went to town. They were each tried, dishonorably discharged, and sentenced to eighteen months' confinement at the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and that was reduced by the reviewing authority to six months. Those five exceptions were the only ones that disobeyed any of the orders that were issued at all. Finally the order came for their discharge. They were discharged at that post, a half a company at a time. They were paid off. They had anywhere from fifty or sixty dollars to, some of them, twelve or thirteen hundred dollars. They went to this little town, which was full of temptations, and, as I stated before, there was not a single man found drunk, nor was there a disturbance of any kind or character reported of these men, and I talked with the chief of police over the telephone frequently. Now, taking into consideration the conduct of these men both before and afterwards, and what I have before stated, leads me to believe that the men did not do that shooting."

Captain Macklin says as to change of opinion as to guilt of men (p. 3136):

"By Senator WARNER:

"Q. Did it not look to you as though some of the men had done the shooting?—A. Yes, sir; it seemed so naturally, on account of the shells.

"Q. And if you had not believed so at the time you would have said something to Major Penrose as to differing with him in his judgment, would you not?—A. Well, I do not believe I would, Senator, because Major Penrose was my commanding officer, and I was not called upon to make any remark to him, or any suggestion or anything.

"Q. But it did make the same impression on you?—A. Yes, sir; it seemed so. It looked very much so.

"Q. And you continued of that opinion, did you not, Captain?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Right along?—A. Yes, sir; I could not believe anything else.

"Q. Did you ever change your opinion?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When was that Captain?—A. Well, it was after the time that the men had stood the strain that they were under at Fort Reno, from the time they left Brownsville until their arrival at Reno, and the duty that they did at Fort Reno; and then seeing the discharge of those men."

Captain Macklin also said, at page 1788:

"Q. Now, Captain, you have investigated the subject a good deal. I understood you to say, so far as your men are concerned, you have taken steps to find out whether or not any of your men were guilty of this shooting.—A. By every means that I thought was possible; yes, sir.

"Q. That is, you have talked with them?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Talked with all of them?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Questioned them and had your noncommissioned officers try to find out?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. As a result of that, can you tell us who did do that shooting?—A. Well, sir; I do not think the men did it.

"Q. You do not think the men did it?—A. No, sir.

"Q. You are satisfied of that, are you?—A. I am satisfied of that. I have studied this subject from every phase of it. I think I have read almost every bit of evidence and testimony that has been given, not only that taken by General Garlington and the other inspectors-general, but in Major Penrose's court-martial, and the longer it goes on, the more I feel satisfied that the men did not do the shooting. It is possible that there were a few shots fired from the barracks or some of those quarters by the men in their fright. Even when I joined the command that night the men were still under a heavy excitement and were much frightened.

"Q. But you have no knowledge whatever of anybody connected with the battalion firing a shot, have you?—A. No, sir; I have not.

"Q. And you have no knowledge of any fact, have you, that leads you to suspect any man in that battalion of having participated in that affair?—A. Not in the least; no, sir."

Lieutenant Grier says (p. 1726 et seq.):

"Q. As I understand, the next morning after the shooting you were convinced that men of the battalion were engaged in the shooting up of the town of Brownsville.—A. In a manner similar to that in which he was. In other words, the circumstantial evidence was such that no reasonable man could think, hardly, but what some soldiers had been implicated in it.

"Q. Yes.—A. Because civilians do not usually carry around bandoliers and Government ammunition——

"Q. No.—A. (Continuing.) For one thing—that is, ordinarily.

"Q. So that no reasonable man would come to any other conclusion?—A. At that time.

"Q. And after coming to that conclusion you remained of that opinion until the men were discharged without honor?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When was that?—A. That was some time late in November; I think from about the 20th to the 26th of the month it took to discharge those men.

"Q. And you were continually endeavoring to find out all you could regarding this shooting, were you not?—A. I was.

"By Senator SCOTT:

"Q. You say you tried to find out who did the shooting?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Were you trying to find out whether somebody else than the soldiers did it, or were you trying to fix the blame on the soldiers?—A. I was in a position, stationed at Fort Reno, where we could only get one side of the story. It would be impossible to get anything else. The soldiers never volunteered any information about the townspeople doing the shooting—never claimed so. They said they didn't know who did it, but they had not.

"Q. But you did not try to find out whether somebody else did it but the soldiers. You were trying to fasten it on the soldiers?—A. Yes, sir; I was trying to find out something from the soldiers.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. The question was asked you, and I do not want it to remain in that way, whether you were trying to fasten it on the soldiers.—A. No, sir; I was not trying to fasten it on the soldiers, but I was trying to find out from some of the old men of the regiment who had been with the regiment before I was born, that I knew were good old men, and would tell the truth, something to clear them.

"Q. That is, it is a fact, is it not, Lieutenant, that instead of trying to fasten it on the soldiers, you were attached to your command, as any other officer would be?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And that you were trying to clear them?—A. Yes, sir; that was my idea, to clear them, and if it had been any of the soldiers to punish the four or five who did it. I wanted to get hold of those who did it, to save the rest of them.

"Q. To save the rest of the command?—A. Yes, sir.

"By Senator WARNER:

"Q. And so you remained of this opinion, that a bunch of the soldiers had done the shooting up of Brownsville from the 13th of August until what day was it?—A. About the 20th of November.

"Q. The 20th of November?—A. Up until the time General Garlington came to the post and delivered the ultimatum to the troops.

"Q. What was there about that ultimatum that changed your opinion? What fact was there that could possibly change your opinion, Lieutenant?—A. It was not the ultimatum itself, but it was the effect of it. When these men did not come up and give up anybody—the names of anybody implicated in that raid—when they knew if they did not there was not any joke about it, but they all go out of the service; and I knew old men like Sergeant Sanders, that I have seen personally handle the meanest kind of a soldier, and handle him mighty well, I began right then to think there was considerable doubt about it. You could not convince me that a bad crowd could keep them from telling what they knew.

"Q. Then you came to the conclusion that Sergeant Sanders did not know it?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did that convince you that nobody in the command did it?—A. I say there were a number of old soldiers.

"Q. How many old soldiers did you talk to?—A. I talked to 50 or 100 of them—almost everyone I met.

"Q. And none of them suggested that the citizens had done the shooting?—A. They never said so.

"Q. Not one of them?—A. They said they didn't know who did it, but that they had not.

"Q. Did Sergeant Sanders in any talk that you had with him ever give you any fact that would indicate that the shooting was done by the citizens?—A. No, sir; he did not."

(Pages 1726–1727):

"Q. They all were. Now, so that we will have it connected, what was it that occurred when General Garlington was there?—A. Well, he conducted an investigation, and had the men in to make sworn statements, and his investigation developed nothing new, so that the battalion was brought out where he could address it; and I think that was Friday of one week, and he told them if they did not deliver up the men that did the shooting on Monday he would recommend that every one of the soldiers that was present with the battalion in Brownsville be discharged without honor.

"Q. Was there anything about that that changed your opinion as to the evidence and circumstances of the shooting up of Brownsville?—A. It was the effect that it produced on the men that impressed.

"Q. That is, instead of changing your opinion, you thought the effect produced on the men would prevent you getting information?—A. No, sir.

"Q. What, then? What effect did it produce on the men?—A. When that ultimatum was delivered, and the men knew that they had from Friday until Monday, the officers got busy with all the soldiers, especially the old noncommissioned officers, and put it right up to them, and told them what was in store for them; that there wasn't any bluff or joke about this proposition; that it was a sure thing—they would go out of the service if they did not tell. And we were not able to get anything out of them. And in addition to that was the behavior of those men when they were discharged. There was no need to have a battalion of another regiment up there at all. The post had never been in better condition, better order, better discipline, the whole time previous than right during the time those men were discharged.

"Q. Is that all there was that would have an effect upon you as to who it was did the shooting?—A. All at that time; but there have been things since.

"Q. What things since?—A. Evidence brought out in the Penrose court-martial.

"Q. What evidence do you refer to?—A. I refer to the discrepancies in the testimony, in the evidence of witnesses for the prosecution in regard to distances, and whether or not they could see men on such a night as that. Also the possibility of those people in Brownsville getting hold of Government ammunition, part of which has been brought up here.

"Q. Then you still remained of the opinion, did you, practically until the Penrose court-martial evidence?—A. Yes, sir; it impressed a doubt upon my mind. I thought it was awfully funny that those men who were almost ready for retirement allowed themselves to be discharged without honor from the service simply to hide a bunch of criminals, if they were among them.

"Q. What did you say about their getting Government ammunition at Brownsville—the citizens?—A. I say there is a possibility they could get it down there. It has been testified to.

"Q. What kind of ammunition; Springfield ammunition?—A. Yes, sir; any kind.

"Q. How could they? What was the possibility of their getting Springfield ammunition down there?—A. Well, there was ammunition left in the barracks down there. That has been testified to, I understand. Sergeant Osborn found some there when the Twenty-sixth Infantry left. Then it would have been a possibility to get those shells out of that box on the porch of B Company barracks.

"Q. That is a possibility?—A. Yes, sir.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. I will ask you a question or two. I understood you to say that the conduct of the men, when the ultimatum was put to them by General Garlington, had an effect upon your mind as to whether they were guilty or not?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. By that you mean to refer to the fact that they did not tell anything when they were informed by him and by the officers of the battalion that unless they did tell who the guilty parties were they would be discharged without honor and lose all the rights they acquired by their long service, but still they refused to tell anything, and still insisted that they did not know anything; and that had an effect on your mind, did it not?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That is, you could not understand why old soldiers like those to whom you have referred would suffer that kind of loss and disgrace for the sake of saving, if they knew of them, a few guilty culprits among their number?—A. That is the idea, exactly, sir.

"Q. Now, I will ask you if it was not assumed, from the very moment that these shells were exhibited to Major Penrose by the citizens of Brownsville, that soldiers were guilty, and if all efforts to find the guilty parties were not confined to finding them among the soldiers?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was there any effort at all to find anybody but the soldiers guilty of the firing——

"Senator WARNER. By whom?

"Q. (Continuing.) By anybody connected with the battalion, or by anybody else of whom you have knowledge?—A. No, sir; there was none that I know of.

"Q. I will ask you if that was not the assumption on which Major Blocksom proceeded in all his investigation, and also the assumption upon which General Garlington proceeded in all his investigation?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And if that was not the assumption on which all the officers of the battalion proceeded in their investigations from that time on?—A. Yes, sir."

THE PURDY TESTIMONY.

When the testimony taken by the citizens' committee of Brownsville immediately after the firing was printed and submitted to the Senate it seemed insufficient to show that the men of the battalion had done the firing. This being pointed out, the President directed Major Blocksom to return to Brownsville, accompanied by Assistant Attorney-General Purdy, to take more formally and under oath all such testimony as might be available in regard to the shooting affray, with special reference to the question whether the soldiers had participated in it.

Acting under this order, Major Blocksom and Mr. Purdy took a great many affidavits of the citizens of Brownsville, detailing their personal experiences at the time of the shooting affray and narrating what they respectively witnessed.

This testimony so taken was submitted to the Secretary of War, who in turn submitted it to the President, with a report as to the nature of it, and thereupon the President sent the same to the Senate, where it was ordered printed, together with other literature bearing on the same general subject, as Document No. 155, part 2.

All this testimony—that taken by the citizens' committee and also that taken by Major Blocksom and Mr. Purdy—was ex parte, without any opportunity to the soldiers to be present or to be represented, to cross-examine, or put to the test in any way whatever the statements made by the various witnesses.

CONCLUSIONS OF THE PRESIDENT AND SECRETARY OF WAR.

Upon this testimony the Secretary of War and the President seemed to feel perfectly satisfied that it had been established beyond any reasonable doubt that certain soldiers of the battalion had done the shooting, and that in all probability many other members of the battalion had knowledge of the guilty parties. They reached this conclusion in the face of the fact that every soldier of the battalion had stated under oath that he had no participation whatever in the shooting and had no knowledge whatever as to who did the shooting, and in face of the further fact that, although the officers of the battalion and the officers of the Inspector-General's Department had made the most diligent inquiries and the most careful and persistent efforts to discover the guilty parties, not a clew had been found to indicate who in the battalion, if anyone, had participated in the shooting, and notwithstanding the further fact that all the officers had stated under oath that they found all their men present or accounted for when the companies were formed in response to the call to arms, which was sounded while the firing was still in progress; and notwithstanding the further fact that as soon as Major Penrose learned from Mayor Combe that his men were charged with the shooting he directed that his officers again verify their men, and verify their guns, and verify their ammunition, and that as soon as it was light enough to see they made a careful inspection of the guns to ascertain whether or not any of them had been fired that night, with the result that again the officers found every man present or accounted for, every gun free from any indication of having been fired, and every cartridge accounted for—not a single one missing.

ACTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Upon the testimony so taken and the various reports made to him, the President found that the raiders were soldiers from the garrison and that, in view of the manifest impossibility of the raiders keeping all knowledge of their identity from their comrades, many if not most of the men of the battalion, knew who the guilty men were, and that inability to get any evidence or even clew to show who they were was due to a "conspiracy of silence," on account of which all had been properly discharged without honor under the following order:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 5, 1906.

The SECRETARY OF WAR:

I have read through General Garlington's report, dated October 22, submitted to me by you. I direct that the recommendations of General Garlington be complied with, and that at the same time the concluding portion of his report be published with our sanction as giving the reasons for the action.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The following is the recommendation of General Garlington referred to in the above order:

"I recommend that orders be issued as soon as practicable discharging, without honor, every man in Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, serving at Fort Brown, Tex., on the night of August 13, 1906, and forever debarring them from reenlisting in the Army or Navy of the United States, as well as from employment in any civil capacity under the Government. In making this recommendation I recognize the fact that a number of men who have no direct knowledge as to the identity of the men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry who actually fired the shots on the night of the 13th of August, 1906, will incur this extreme penalty."

Doubtless the reports of Major Blocksom and General Garlington as to what, in their opinion, the testimony established, had as much, if not more, to do than the testimony itself with creating in the mind of the President the belief upon which he acted. Running all through the reports of these officers there are evidences in their statements that they were from the first of the opinion that the men were guilty, and that proceeding upon such assumption everything in their favor was minimized and everything that indicated guilt was magnified.

Major Blocksom, in his report made a few days after he reached Brownsville, August 29, commenced with an unqualified statement that the trouble was caused by the soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry; "that there was no doubt Mrs. Evans was seized by the hair and thrown violently to the ground by a tall negro soldier," a statement that has not, down to this moment, received the support of any sworn testimony; that he was sure the three shots that went through Mr. Yturria's house came from a point near the center of B Company's upper back porch; that Stark's house was shot into, "evidently mistaking it for Tate's house," which was adjoining; that "the raiders were soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry can not be doubted;" that the call to arms was sounded by order of the sergeant of the guard "probably too early during the firing to be genuine," although he should have known, if he did not know, that it was sounded by order of Major Penrose; that "it must be confessed the colored soldier is much more aggressive in his attitude on the social equality question than he used to be."

When the evidence upon which these statements were made was carefully analyzed, it was found utterly insufficient to warrant such conclusions. Nevertheless he embodied in his report the following recommendation:

"If satisfactory evidence concerning the identity of the criminals does not come from members of the battalion before a certain date, to be fixed by the War Department, I recommend that all enlisted men of the three companies present on the night of August 13 be discharged the service and debarred from reenlisting in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps."

Without stopping to review in detail General Garlington's report, it is sufficient to say that in his testimony before the committee he frankly admitted that he entered upon it assuming that the men were guilty, and that all he did was for the purpose of disclosing if he could who the guilty soldiers were. At no time did it occur to him that by any possibility anybody other than the soldiers could have done the shooting. The general character of his report and his general testimony on the subject may be inferred from the following:

Brig. Gen. Ernest Garlington (Vol. III, p. 2746):

"Q. Just one other thing. You said a while ago that you would not believe these soldiers without corroboration—would not believe any of them who denied that he had participated in the shooting, or that he had knowledge of the shooting. I understood that, in effect, to be your statement.—A. That is substantially what I stated. I did not state that I would not believe any of them who denied participation, because I believe that there are a great many of those men who did not participate.

* * * * * * *

"Q. You would not believe any of them who denied having knowledge as to who did the shooting?—A. Not without corroboration; no, sir; not now.

"Q. If anyone would come forward and tell you that he knew who did the shooting would you believe him?—A. Not unless he had corroboration.

"Q. Not without corroboration?—A. No, sir.

"Q. You would not believe him either way?—A. No, sir.

* * * * * * *

"Q. If any man would come forward and say that he shot up the town, or that he knew that this, that, or the other man did it, who was a member of the battalion, you would believe him then?—A. No; I would not accept any one man's information or statement as to another who did the shooting. In other words, I think that the condition now is that you can not get the truth from those people about the Brownsville incident. That is the general proposition that I make.

"Q. You said that was the case when you were there, too, didn't you?—A. After I talked to them a while.

"Q. Well, I say you came to that conclusion?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And yet that is the very thing you were trying to get out of them, and the very thing you recommended that they be dismissed for, because they would not tell you who it was that did it?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You stood ready, then, to believe any man who would come forward and say, "I did not do it, but somebody else did it?"—A. I stood ready to follow up any clew that any of those men gave me, and then to pass my opinion upon what I found.

"Q. But you would not have believed them without corroboration?—A. No, sir.

"Q. None of them? How long have you had such a disparaging opinion of the veracity of colored men?—A. I did not say that of colored men. I am talking about the Brownsville battalion.

"Q. Do you think colored people, generally, are truthful?—A. No, sir; I do not.

"Q. You do not?—A. No.

"Q. You would not believe their testimony ordinarily, even under oath, would you?—A. Where their own interest or some special interest was concerned. It depends entirely upon the circumstances.

"Q. You think a colored man might testify truthfully about the weather, but that he would not testify truthfully about a crime?—A. He might have some difficulty in testifying about the weather.

"Q. Just now he would, but if he were testifying about a crime that he was charged with, or that some of his comrades were charged with, you would not believe him?—A. Not without corroboration."

MOTIVE.

The motive for the crime was thought to be, although there was no such testimony, to visit revenge on the community indiscriminately for the hostile feeling of the citizens and their treatment of the soldiers as to saloons, in the Tate affair, and in the other less important altercations. It does not seem to have occurred to those making this claim that a lot of hoodlums such as usually engage in such affrays may have had as their motive a purpose to get rid of the negro soldiers. It is unnecessary to speculate beyond what may be involved in the question as to the guilt of the soldiers. If it were not, other suggestions might be made as to the possible motives of the raiders if they were not soldiers.

II. CHARACTER OF THE TESTIMONY.

The testimony against the soldiers may be divided into two classes: (1) That of so-called "eyewitnesses," and (2) that which was circumstantial and confirmatory.

THE EYEWITNESSES.

The "eyewitnesses" were citizens of Brownsville. It was natural for them to share the prejudices that had been aroused against the soldiers and to jump to the conclusion that they were doing the shooting. In this way can be accounted for the belief most of them expressed that the soldiers did the shooting and that they saw enough to satisfy them of that fact. But aside from all this their testimony is manifestly unreliable. In the first place because enough is shown as to most of them to make it clear that they were not able to see as claimed because of the darkness of the night and the general situation.

Major Blocksom said in his first report (S. Doc. No. 155, pt. 1, p. 63): "None of the individual raiders was recognized. Streets are poorly lighted, and it was a dark night. Those who saw them were busy trying to keep out of sight themselves."

Without taking up the testimony of each witness in detail, it is enough to say that in a general way all testified that hearing the firing they rushed to the windows of their respective houses, looked out into an unusually dark night, and claimed to see men moving through the streets and alleys at the places of the firing, carrying guns like those used by the soldiers, and wearing soldiers' uniforms, and that in this way, while they could not identify any individuals, they did recognize the firing party as soldiers. The distance at which these witnesses, respectively, saw what they related and recognized the raiders as soldiers vary all the way from 30 feet up to 150 feet and more, and in no instances, except those hereafter specifically mentioned, were any of these witnesses aided by any kind of artificial light.

The general question is, therefore, whether the darkness was of such character as to make it impossible for them to see with such distinctness as would enable them to testify as they have.

A DARK NIGHT.

The testimony establishes beyond question that while it was a starlit night, yet it was unusually dark. A number of instances are testified about to illustrate the character of night and the effect of the darkness upon the vision.

Captain Macklin says (p. 3127):

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Now, can you recall any circumstances that will indicate the darkness of the night, any experience that you had, meeting men, or the difficulty you had in recognizing men?—A. Yes, sir; I had several personal experiences that night. After Major Penrose put my company on a chain of sentinels it was necessary for me to visit those sentinels, and at the upper end of the garrison, extending beyond the garrison wall, I had several posts, just how many I have forgotten now, and in one or two instances I could not find them, and had to call out to them to locate them; and in those cases I found the men within 10 or 15 feet of me.

* * * * * * *

"Q. How far away from you, according to your recollection, could you distinguish the kind of clothing the men were wearing, if you could see them, as to whether they wore uniforms or not?—A. Well, I should say 10 or 15 feet, Senator; not over that.

"Q. You would not think it possible to tell whether the men you might see were white men or negroes, at a distance of a hundred feet away in the dark?—A. I don't believe you could tell it at 15 feet; in fact, on those visits there that I went on I carried my revolver in my hand.

"Q. All the time?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you could not tell whether they had on yellow uniforms or not?—A. You could not see at all. Everything was just a blank."

* * * * * * *

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Did you have anybody in your company who was so marked with freckles or spots of any kind on his face as to be noticeable?—A. No, sir; I did not. Nearly all the men of our battalion were pretty dark. There were a few light ones, but I don't remember any of them that had freckles.

"Q. Was it possible, remembering the darkness of that night, to see freckles or spots on the face of a man any distance away from you?—A. No, sir; I do not think so. I do not believe, in fact, I am very certain, that you could not have told a white man from a colored man 10 feet away."

Captain Lyons says as to darkness of night (p. 3154):

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Can you give us any illustration—can you relate any incidents that came within your personal experience that night, or under your observation, that will enable us to judge how dark it was; I mean any incident that would indicate whether you had difficulty or otherwise in distinguishing persons or objects?—A. I remember that after the company was formed Major Penrose called over to me and asked me if my company was formed. I said that it was. He came over from the direction of B Company barracks—my company—and he had to get very close to me, then, before I could see who it was. Also, in calling the roll I had to use a lantern when the men were behind that wall in order to distinguish who each man was.

"Q. Can you tell us how far away, without the aid of any artificial light, you could distinguish whether men were white men or colored men?—A. I should think about 10 feet would be the maximum.

"Q. At what distance could you distinguish whether they were clothed in uniforms or other kind of clothes?—A. Of course this is only my opinion—

"Q. Yes.—A. I should say about the same distance.

"Q. Do you think you could have told whether a man was a white man or a black man, or whether he was in uniform or in citizen's clothing, at a distance of 25 or 30 feet away?—A. I do not, sir."

Lieutenant Lawrason says, as to darkness of night (p. 3146):

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. That is all on that point. Now, Lieutenant, can you recall any incident that happened the night of the 13th, after the firing commenced, that would enable you to give us, by relating it, an idea of how dark it was? What difficulty did you have, if any, in recognizing men or objects?—A. I recollect it was a dark, starlight night—that is, there was no moon; the only light was starlight—there was no clouds in the sky, though—and I came quite close to several men without recognizing them. I remember I passed a man who had been sent over to my quarters to awaken me, as I went out. I ran past him, and he recognized me, I suppose; I did not recognize him, and he called after me when I had passed, and I turned back and he gave me his message.

"Q. How close were you when you passed without recognition?—A. I believe we were inside of 6 feet, sir.

"Q. Six feet?—A. I believe about 4 or 5 feet away.

"Q. Do you recall any other instance similar to that that would show the difficulty you had in recognizing men or objects?—A. No particular instance, sir. I recollect that I had some difficulty in recognizing some of the men when posting them around, and some of the noncommissioned officers when posting reliefs.

"Q. It was so dark, in other words, if I understand you, that you had to be close to a man to recognize him?—A. Yes, sir; go by his voice and general appearance. I knew most of the men."

Lieutenant Grier, as to character of night (p. 1735):

"Q. As to the character of this night; it was a dark night?—A. Yes, sir; a dark, starlit night.

"Q. So that when you met the sergeant, you could not tell who he was until he got within a very few feet of you?—A. About as close as I am to you.

"Q. So that it may be in the record—that is about how far?—A. About 5 or 6 feet.

"Senator SCOTT. It is nearer 9 feet.

"Senator WARNER. We are doing this.

"Senator BULKELEY. It is more than 6 feet.

"Senator SCOTT. Say 9 feet.

"By Senator BULKELEY:

"Q. When you met a man on the parade ground at that distance, could you tell whether he was a white man or a black man?—A. I could tell that he was a soldier, because he had khaki on; but I could not see his face until he got right up close to me.

"Q. At that distance you could not tell, on the parade ground, whether he was a white man or a black man?—A. No, sir; I could not, sir."

Major Penrose says as to night being dark (pp. 3017, 3018, 3019, 3020, 3021, 3023):

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Could you recall any incident, which you could relate to us, which would indicate how dark it was?—A. Yes, sir; I could not tell one of my own officers over 10 feet away.

"Q. You could not tell one of your own officers?—A. No, sir.

"Q. That you remember very distinctly?—A. Very distinctly.

"Q. It was as dark as that?—A. It was as dark as that. I remember in walking up and down the line where the men were all posted, and I recall it when Hairston came to my house.

"Q. Hairston?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He was the sentinel?—A. Yes, sir; No. 3 around the line of officers' quarters. He came around to my quarters, and I almost ran into him when I came out of the door, and I could not distinguish who the man was at all, and I did not know until the next morning at 9 o'clock, when I inquired.

"Q. You did not know who he was?—A. I say I ran into him, brushed against him, as I came out of the house. Of course I did not look particularly to see who it was. And in walking up and down the line I had to go very close to the officers to tell whether they were white men or colored men.

"Q. Now, I call your attention to the corner of Fourteenth and Washington streets. I am pointing to it [indicating on map]. State whether or not one standing at that corner and looking down Fourteenth street could see men crossing Fourteenth street on the Cowen alley, and see them distinctly enough to count them and tell what kind of clothing they were wearing, and whether they were white men or colored men, without any artificial light and aid. Could one do that?—A. I do not think it is possible, sir.

"Q. Yes.—A. I do not think it is possible.

"Q. Now, I will ask you whether or not, standing in the window in the second story of the Leahy House, and looking out across Fourteenth street and across the alley to the place to which I now point, namely, the side of the alley opposite the Cowen house, one could see that night distinctly enough without any artificial light to recognize men and determine whether they were white or colored and how they were dressed?—A. I do not think so, sir.

"Senator PETTUS. Say, by the flash of the guns.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Well, by the flash of the guns?—A. No, sir; you could not by the flash of the guns.

"Q. Now, tell us whether or not the flash of the guns would aid in that.—A. I do not think at all. It is so instantaneous, so slight, that I do not think you can distinguish anything by the flash of the gun.

"Q. Could one, looking out of the upper story of the telegraph building, at the corner of Elizabeth street and Garrison road, for instance, see people clambering over the wall up about the mouth of the Cowen alley?—A. No, indeed, sir. No, sir; they could not.

"Q. There are no lights in there in that locality at all, are there?—A. No, sir; there was a light at the gate.

"Q. What kind of a light was that?—A. An oil lamp.

"Q. An oil lamp?—A. Yes, sir; I couldn't tell you how many candlepower; I don't know.

"Q. At the gate. That is 130 feet from the mouth of the Cowen alley, is it not?—A. About that, I believe, sir. But I was going to say this, Senator: There is an oil house I intended to tell about in here [indicating on map].

"Q. Yes; where is that?—A. About between the figure '4' and the letter 'F' [indicating on map].

"Q. Right in there?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. With reference to B barracks?—A. Yes, sir; it is shown in one of the pictures attached to Mr. Purdy's report. Now, it had been raining and was quite muddy.

"Q. It had been raining?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And it was quite muddy?—A. Yes, sir; and from the light here I could see there was a mud puddle about there [indicating on map].

"Q. How far is that point from the gate?—A. I presume that is 40 feet, maybe 30 or 40 feet. Now, I am guessing, gentlemen; I do not know absolutely.

"Q. There was a mud puddle there?—A. There was a mud puddle there I could see. When I went down the line, I went around this mud puddle, and went right in behind it to inspect these men along the fence, and I got in this mud puddle right around east of this oil house, that I didn't see at all. I got in water that came over the lacings of my shoes.

"Q. You got in it before you knew it was there?—A. Yes, sir; before I knew it was there.

"Q. And you were looking where you were going?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. State whether or not you could see the men posted as sentinels there.—A. I could not until I got out beyond the oil house. I could not until I got close to them.

"Senator TALIAFERRO. Does the witness understand that a number of witnesses have testified that they did see these men under the conditions which you are describing?

"Senator FORAKER. I have not recited that to the witness, but I have no objection to doing it if it is desired, at the request of Senator TALIAFERRO.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. At the suggestion of Senator TALIAFERRO, I will say to you that a number of witnesses have testified—Mr. and Mrs. Rendall have testified—that they saw people assembling up near or opposite the mouth of the alley; saw them going over the wall at about that point—I can not give the exact language from recollection—and Lieutenant Dominguez testified that he looked down from the corner of Washington and Fourteenth streets, along Fourteenth street, and saw two squads of soldiers of four men each cross Fourteenth street, in the alley, and recognized their uniforms, and that they were colored soldiers. Now, knowing that that has been testified to——

"Senator SCOTT. Mrs. Leahy testified that she saw sixteen.

"Senator FORAKER. I am going to speak of that.

"Q. (Continuing.) Knowing that these witnesses have testified to these things, does that change your belief?—A. No, sir; it does not.

"Q. Mrs. Leahy has testified, as nearly as I can recall her testimony, that she looked out of her second-story window and saw sixteen men come up the alley and cross Fourteenth street after doing a lot of firing in that neighborhood, and she describes them with great accuracy, as to their clothing, and so forth. Would the fact that she so testified change the opinion that you have given, that they could not see them?—A. No, sir; I think they are mistaken.

"Q. Mr. McDonald testified that he stood at the corner of the alley, the mouth of the alley, and looked down Fifteenth street and saw men about the gate, about the telegraph office, I think, opposite the gate, and that they divided there, and some went up Elizabeth street, but some came up to the alley and turned down the alley, and after they turned down the alley he came to the corner and looked down and saw them firing into the Cowen house, and he said that he could recognize them and distinguish that they were soldiers. Do you think he could do that?—A. I do not, Senator.

"Q. Mrs. Leahy testified not only that she saw sixteen men, but that she saw two of the men so distinctly that she could describe them accurately, one as a very dark negro and the other as a mulatto, with spots all over his face.—A. At what distance, sir?

"Q. He was in the alley, somewhere about the alley and Fourteenth street, somewhere about that corner, and she was upstairs in her house.

"By Senator SCOTT:

"She testified, when I asked the question, 35 feet.

"Senator FORAKER. She said 35 feet, but it was evidently 60 feet [indicating on map].

"Senator WARNER. I submit that we should go by the evidence.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"She said that she should judge it was about 35 feet. Do you think she could——A. I do not, gentlemen. My recollection of that night is very, very distinct."

If these witnesses were correct in their description of the night and the effect of the darkness upon the vision, then it was impossible for any of the witnesses who testified about seeing the soldiers without the aid of artificial light to have seen them with any such distinctness as to make their testimony at all reliable. All such testimony may be dismissed without further comment.

TESTIMONY OF PRECIADO.

Paulino S. Preciado testified that he was at the Tillman saloon and that he saw the men who fired the volley that killed Frank Natus under the light of the lamps that were shining in the court, and that he could see distinctly how the men were armed and how they were uniformed, and that he recognized them positively as soldiers. His testimony is that they stepped through the open gateway leading from the alley and advanced into the courtyard the distance of "two or three paces," where he could see them distinctly. If this statement were uncontradicted and unimpeached much might be claimed for it, but it is impeached and contradicted, in the first place by the testimony of Preciado himself given before the grand jury, where he stated:

Paulino Preciado, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"I live in Brownsville, Tex. On the night of the shooting I was in the Ruby saloon, belonging to Mr. Tillman, near midnight. We—myself, Antonio Torres, Nicolas Sanchez Alanis, and Mr. Tillman—were sitting in the yard, when we heard some shots. Tillman got up at once and left us. We remained with the bartender, Frank Natus; the latter closed the doors toward the street; in the meantime the shooting became heavier. Then the bartender went to close the door towards the alley. He went about 20 feet towards the door, when a volley was fired. Natus exclaimed, 'Ay Dios,' and fell down; I saw him because I was looking in that direction when the shots were fired. I saw I was in danger and went to one side. I could not see anybody in the alley, as it was dark out there and I was in the light. I heard no word spoken. I hid in a corner where a brick wall protected me until the shooting was over, then I went to close the alley gate. While I was in the corner I received a slight flesh wound on the left hand, and another passed through my coat and vest, breaking my spectacles, which I carried in the left breast pocket of my coat, but did not hurt me. I think I received the shots at the time Frank Natus fell, but did not notice it at the time. When the shooting was over I went and opened the front door and asked the crowd of people who were there if there was an officer amongst them. Mr. Victoriano Fernandez came forward, and I told him what had happened.

"(Signed) PAULINO S. PRECIADO."

Sworn to any subscribed before me this 10th day of September, 1906.

WM. VOLZ,
Foreman Grand Jury.

The contradiction by this witness in his testimony as given before Mr. Purdy and as given before the grand jury so thoroughly discredited this witness that Secretary Taft addressed to the President the following letter:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,
"Washington, January 14, 1907.

"Very respectfully,

"WM. H. TAFT, Secretary of War.

"The PRESIDENT."

EL PORVENIR.

It is further impeached and contradicted by his statement of the occurrences of that night published two days afterwards in his newspaper, El Porvenir. We quote as follows from that statement:

[Translation of an article written in the Spanish language and published in El Porvenir, issue of August 16, 1906, a newspaper published in Brownsville, Tex. Translated by J. M. Sheridan.]

"UNHEARD-OF AND UNQUALIFIABLE ASSAULT MADE BY COLORED TROOPS ON SEVERAL HOUSES IN THIS CITY THE NIGHT OF THE 13TH AND 14TH OF AUGUST, 1906—ONE DEAD—WOUNDED.

"About 11.30 p. m. last Monday several shots were heard in this city in the direction of the barracks (cuartel).

"Some saloons (cantinas) on Elizabeth street closed their doors, and the shots continued to increase, creating a sensational alarm.

"The audaciousness of the troops was unheard of, savage, criminal.

"The number of soldiers who fired into buildings and homes is not known, although it is affirmed that there were 65.

"They scattered through the center of the city and kept up a steady fire.

"Señor Ignacio Dominguez, lieutenant of police, in the performance of his duty repaired to the point where the firing commenced and received two shots in the right hand and had to have his arm amputated.

"He also lost the horse he was riding.

"Señor Macedonio Ramirez Prieto, employed in attending to the city lights, had his hat shot off.

"The editor (director) of El Porvenir, in company with Messrs. Nicolas Sanchez Alanis and Antonio Torres, had just arrived at Señor Thillman's saloon (cantina) when the shooting commenced. The proprietor of the saloon immediately came out into the street, and a young man employed in the establishment, named Frank Natus, proceeded to close the doors opening on the street (calle).

"Immediately afterwards he started to close the side street entrance (zaguan del callejon), but he hadn't taken more than five steps when a volley of six or seven shots was fired through the entrance (zaguan), one of which, piercing his heart, caused him to fall, whereupon he cried out 'Oh, God,' and died instantly, his body lying close to the curbstone of the well (brocal del algiber).

"The writer was slightly grazed by a bullet on the left hand, and another commenced by destroying some receipts in his breast pocket, broke a pair of eyeglasses, and penetrated his coat and vest, but did not wound him in the chest or elsewhere.

"These three gentlemen sought cover in different parts of the house, and after observing profound silence for a few minutes Preciado sought his companions, Señor Torres being first to respond. The former said he was wounded, as he was bleeding, and an examination was made to see if he had received any other wounds. No other injury having been discovered, he went to close the side entrance (zaguan), whereupon Sanchez Alanis warned him not to expose himself. However, as no confusion or noise was heard in the side street Sanchez Alanis (este) assisted him in closing the door.

"The three then assembled in the saloon (cantina), commenting upon the case and awaiting the proprietor; but as he was slow in coming, Preciado opened one of the street doors (una puerta de la calle) and called to a group of people standing in front of the saloon (cantina) known as "La International," telling an employee to make known what had happened to the young man, Frank Natus.

"The people composing the group came over to look at the corpse, which was left lying on the ground until a justice of the peace could be sent for.

"Employees of the city and of the county and private persons gathered and about 2 o'clock in the morning we (the writer?) started to our house, people being everywhere on the lookout.

"The American element is indignant over the conduct of the colored troops, for those troops of the United States, paid and maintained by the nation, and armed to serve as a guaranty and inspire respect, have committed an offense which must be rigidly curbed, as it was a criminal act.

"The majesty of the law, the dignity of our citizens, and the peace of our families demand that steps be taken without loss of time to punish this outrage and later ask that the troops be relieved, to the end that we have in Brownsville the guaranties that are now wanting.

"Through an act of Providence we (the writer) are still alive, and we avail ourselves of this occasion to thank all who so kindly inquired after our health, for the first report was to the effect that our wound was serious."

PRECIADO'S CLAIM FOR DAMAGES.

His statement is further discredited by the fact that at the time when he testified he was asserting a claim against the United States for damages for personal injuries he had sustained on the ground that they had been inflicted by the wrongful conduct of the soldiers of the United States. It was absolutely necessary to his damage case when he testified, as well as in the prosecution of his claim, that he should establish as a fact and beyond any question that it was the soldiers who did the shooting.

BULLET FOUND IN CRIXELL POST.

But finally he is contradicted conclusively by the fact established beyond any question whatever that one of the shots that was fired through the gateway leading from Tillman's premises into the alley at the time when Natus was killed passed on through the open door into the front room and then through the window of the front room and across the street, where it lodged in a post in front of Crixell's saloon, from which subsequently it was bored out by Lieutenant Leckie and found to be a bullet without any steel jacket and of a different composition from that of any of the bullets used by the soldiers; in other words, a bullet such as the soldiers could not have fired from their rifles.

An analysis by Doctor Hillebrand shows that it was composed of—

Lead	96.36
Tin	2.05
Antimony	1.29

This composition does not correspond to that of the guard cartridge. The composition of that bullet is—

Lead	90.00
Antimony	1.50

The tin and antimony of the guard cartridge bullet combined is in proportion to the lead as 1 to 9, while the analysis shows that the composition of the bullet bored out of the Crixell post is tin and antimony combined, 3.34, lead 96.36, or almost exactly 1 part of tin and antimony combined to 29 parts of lead; or, in other words, the tin and antimony combined in the guard cartridge bullet amount to practically three times the quantity of tin and antimony combined in the bullet that was cut out of the Crixell post.

Neither does it correspond to the composition of the bullets made by the Union Metallic Cartridge Company in which antimony was used, for in those bullets the proportion of antimony was 2 per cent.

While in weighing the result of an analysis there must always be an allowance for slight variations, there is no ground for the allowance of any such gross variation as must be assumed to justify the claim that this was either a guard cartridge bullet or a U. M. C. bullet of the antimony variety.

But that this was not a guard cartridge bullet, the testimony is absolutely conclusive. Each company had issued to it only 650 rounds of this kind of ammunition. The testimony shows that each of the companies had every round of this ammunition, not only after the firing, but also when they were finally discharged, and all their ammunition was turned in at Fort Reno in November, 1906, except 5 rounds, belonging to Company D, which were fully accounted for by Captain Lyon.

At pages 273, 274, and 275, Volume I of the record, will be found the ordnance returns for Company C. At page 273 is found the report made at Fort Niobrara, Nebr., June 30, 1906, which shows that the company received May 14, 1906, 650 ball cartridges, reduced range (or guard cartridges), and that at the time of the report there were remaining on hand of these cartridges 650.

On page 274 is found the return for this company, dated at Fort Reno, Okla., January 1, 1907, which shows with respect to guard cartridges as follows:

On hand from last return 650
Remaining on hand to be accounted for on next return 650

Accompanying the first of these reports is the following certificate:

"I certify that the foregoing return exhibits a correct statement of the public property in my charge during the half year ended June 30, 1906, and that the maximum strength of the company during the half year was sixty-five enlisted men.

"Station, Fort Niobrara, Nebr., June 30, 1906.

"(Signed) EDGAR A. MACKLIN,
"Captain, Twenty-fifth Infantry, Commanding Company."

The second report is certified to as follows:

"I certify that the foregoing return exhibits a correct statement of the public property in my charge during the half year ended December 31, 1906, and that the maximum strength of the company during the half year was 65 enlisted men.

"Station, Fort Reno, Okla., January 1, 1907.

"(Signed) EDGAR A. MACKLIN,
"Captain, Twenty-fifth Infantry, Commanding Company."

In his testimony at page 1771, Captain Macklin was interrogated as to these reports and testified as follows:

"Q. I was going to call your attention to your report, so far as the ammunition is concerned. I have put into the record here at page 273 your ordnance returns, in so far as they relate to small arms and ammunition taken from the War Department. I find at the foot of this report the following certificate:

"'I certify that the foregoing return exhibits a correct statement of the public property in my charge during the half year ended June 30, 1906, and that the maximum strength of the company during the half year was sixty-five enlisted men.'

"That certificate was truthful and accurate, was it?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. State whether or not the amount of ammunition shown to be in your company, and for which you were responsible, was accurately given in that return.—A. It was, sir.

"Q. As the result of actual counting?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And inspection?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I see another report by you, which is printed on page 274 of our record, dated January 1, 1907, with a similar certificate. Will you look at that report and state whether that is also accurate?—A. (After examination.) That report, Senator, is accurate as counted by my second lieutenant. I was sick in the hospital at the time that was made, and he made it and verified it and I made the return.

"Q. I call your attention to the 5,700 ball cartridges which according to that report remained on hand—the 1,100 blank cartridges, the 130 dummy cartridges, and the 650 ball cartridges, reduced range.—A. Yes, sir; that is correct.

"Q. That is correct, is it?—A. Yes, sir; that I have verified since that date.

"Q. You have verified that since that date?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You still have that amount on hand?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you had that amount of ammunition in your company the night of August 13, 1906, did you?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Captain, can you tell us what kind of ammunition your company was supplied with on the night of August 13, 1906?—A. Yes, sir; with the cartridge known as the 'guard' cartridge.

"Q. The one I last called your attention to on the return?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That is the reduced range cartridge?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How many of those did you have in the company?—A. I had 650 rounds.

"Q. When did you get those 650 rounds?—A. I got them a year ago this last March.

"Q. You got them at Fort Niobrara, along with the other ammunition?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You never had but 650 of those cartridges, did you?—A. That is all; yes, sir.

"Q. And your men had these cartridges in their possession on the night of August 13?—A. Yes, sir. That is the only cartridge they had.

"Q. Tell us, now, how it came that they had that kind of cartridge and no other kind of cartridge at that time, if you know?—A. That cartridge was issued by the Ordnance Department of the Army for guard duty only, and in the garrison duty it was the only cartridge that the men were supposed to carry. All other ammunition was turned in, and each soldier of my company had 10 rounds of that ammunition.

"Q. Where was this issued to your company?—A. It was issued at Brownsville.

"Q. Will your property book show that issue? The book is right before you; will it show it?—A. I think it will, sir. I can not say positively.

"Q. The property book is kept by——A. The quartermaster-sergeant.

"Senator FORAKER. I will have to recall Sergeant McMurray for that.

"The WITNESS (after examination of book). Yes, sir; here it is.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. I will ask you if the property book of the company does not show that each man had issued to him guard cartridges, 10?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That runs the same all the way through?—A. It should run the same all the way through.

"Q. When you went from Fort Niobrara to Fort Brown, what kind of ammunition did you have?—A. We carried 20 rounds of ball ammunition.

"Q. And then when you got to Fort Brown you had that turned in and issued what?—A. In two or three days after arrival at Fort Brown the ball ammunition of my company was turned in.

"Q. Yes.—A. And I notified the men that I would make frequent inspection of lockers to see that all the ammunition was turned in, and I was satisfied within a few days afterwards that all my ammunition had been turned in.

"Q. The 20 rounds they were charged with and any surplus that might have been accumulated, of any kind, also?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You made that examination at Fort Brown?—A. Yes, sir; I made several inspections of it.

"Q. So that you are able to state that the night of this firing your men had no ammunition whatever in their possession except only this guard ammunition?—A. I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind; yes, sir.

"Q. This guard ammunition has, as we understand it, only about 15 grains of powder in the cartridge?—A. I don't know exactly how much, but the cartridge itself has a distinctive mark.

"Q. And it has a lead bullet, without any steel jacket?—A. Yes, sir; and it has a distinctive mark around the top part of the cartridge.

"Q. Did you or not make any examination after the firing to see whether or not your men had all this ammunition?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. This guard ammunition, I mean.—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And it was all there?—A. All accounted for; yes sir."

The ordnance reports of Company B, made by Lieutenant Lawrason, at Fort Niobrara, June 30, 1906, and found at page 269, shows that 650 rounds of guard cartridges were issued to that company at Fort Niobrara May 7, 1906, and that no other ammunition of that kind was issued to it, and that it had exactly that number of these cartridges on hand at the time when the report was made, which report is certified to in the usual form.

Lieutenant Lawrason, who was in command of Company B the night of the shooting, turned over the command of that company to First Lieut. J. A. Higgins, September 17, 1906, and on that day made a report, found at page 271 of our record, which shows that he had on hand from last return 650 guard cartridges, and that on that date he transferred to Lieutenant Higgins, with other company property, exactly 650 of these cartridges. Lieutenant Lawrason certifies to this report as follows:

"I certify that I have made a careful inventory of the various quantities of small-arms ammunition for which I am accountable, and have taken up on my return all surplus ammunition on hand, and that said return shows the actual quantities of small-arms ammunition on hand at the end of the period for which it is rendered.

"(Signed) GEO. C. LAWRASON,
"Second Lieutenant, Twenty-fifth Infantry."

He also further certifies:

"I certify that the foregoing return exhibits a correct statement of the public property in my charge during the half year ended September 17, 1906, and that the maximum strength of the company during the half year was 63 enlisted men.

"Station, Fort Reno, Okla., September 17, 1906.

"(Signed) GEO. C. LAWRASON,
"Second Lieutenant, Twenty-fifth Infantry,
"Commanding Company."

This report is also certified to by J. A. Higgins, first lieutenant, Twenty-fifth Infantry, commanding Company B:

"I certify that all the ordnance and ordnance stores enumerated on this return as 'transferred to First Lieut. J. A. Higgins, Twenty-fifth Infantry,' were this 17th day of September, 1906, received by me from Second Lieut. George C. Lawrason, Twenty-fifth Infantry.

"Post-office address, Fort Reno, Okla.

"(Signed) J. A. HIGGINS,
"First Lieutenant, Twenty-fifth Infantry,
"Commanding Company B."

Lieutenant Lawrason testifies to the accuracy of these reports and the certificates attached. At page 1593 he testifies specifically with respect to guard cartridges, as follows:

"Q. You had 650 of those cartridges. If you will turn to page 273 following there, you will see that Capt. Edgar A. Macklin certified that Company C had 650 reduced-range cartridges?—A. Yes, sir; I believe that is all that was issued to any company of the Twenty-fifth at Fort Niobrara.

"Q. Captain Lyon, as you will see by reference to page 278, also had 650 of these cartridges. That is correct, then, is it?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I have called your attention to this with particularity because you stated you thought you had only a thousand rounds of these cartridges. In fact, you had exactly 650 rounds, did you not?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you did not use any of it at all—that is, you did not expend any of it while you were in command of the company?—A. No, sir; none of that was expended."

He further testified, at page 1593, that the next day after the firing he took up the ball ammunition and issued the guard cartridges to his men, 20 rounds to each man as far as it would go. Having only 650 rounds, there was not enough to supply each of his men. Those who did not receive ammunition of this character he supplied with ball ammunition. His testimony on this point is as follows:

"Q. On the morning of the 15th, when your company came off duty, you say you took up this ball cartridge to some extent and issued guard cartridges in place of the ball cartridges. That is what I understood you to say?—A. Yes, sir.

"Senator WARNER. He took up all the ball cartridges.

"Senator FORAKER. No; he said he took up a part.

"Senator WARNER. How was that, Lieutenant?

"The WITNESS. I do not believe I had enough guard ammunition to go around. I had 20 rounds of ammunition to a man.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. That is the way I understood it. You took up your 20 rounds of ball cartridges and then issued the guard cartridges, 20 rounds to each man, as far as it would go?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And then pieced out to the others, who did not receive the guard ammunition, with the ball cartridges?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you continued to have only that kind of ammunition until you got ready to leave there?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Please state, Lieutenant—we are not interested beyond that—whether, when this exchange of ammunition was made on the morning of the 15th, you examined the ammunition to see whether each man had all of his cartridges or not; whether or not each man's ammunition was checked up and found to be intact.—A. Yes, sir; it is my recollection that when the ammunition that was issued the night before—that is, on the night of the 13th—was turned in each man's ammunition was checked up, and it was seen that he retained in his possession only 20 rounds.

"Q. That was done, then, on the morning of the 14th?—A. I do not recollect for certain the date, but I remember——

"Q. But you do remember distinctly that each man's ammunition was checked up, do you not?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And it was found to be accurate, to a cartridge, was it not?—A. Yes, sir."

The ordnance returns for Company D made by Captain Lyon, found at pages 276 and 278, show that 650 guard cartridges were issued to his company May 7; that no others were ever issued to it, and that he had all of them on hand when he made his return at Fort Niobrara, June 30, 1906, and that he had remaining on hand 645 when he made his return December 31, 1906, and that the five missing cartridges were expended long after the date of the affray, as set forth in statement made by him on muster and pay roll, to the accuracy of which he certifies in the usual form.

No extra ammunition of this kind was at any time accessible to either of these companies, so they had no opportunity to secure additional ammunition of this kind. Had any of it been used, even a single cartridge, that fact would have been developed when the ammunition was verified after the firing, as well as at the time when it was returned to the Government when the soldiers were discharged at Fort Reno.

Aside from this positive proof by which every such cartridge was accounted for, there is, in favor of the soldiers, the utter improbability that if they shot up the town they would have used on such an occasion guard cartridges with only 15 grains of powder, not designed for offensive operations, instead of their regular ball cartridges with 40 grains of powder, with which Companies B and D were already supplied, and from which companies, if there was a conspiracy as claimed, a supply might have been obtained for any men of Company C who might have participated.

The testimony shows that one trouble in promptly forming Company C and placing it in position that night was due to the fact that the men were unwilling to go to their position behind the wall for the defense of the reservation, which they supposed was being attacked, until they could be given ball ammunition.

At page 692 Lieutenant Grier, who was in command of Company C at the time of the firing, testified that while his company was forming he found Quartermaster-Sergeant McMurray and Artificer Rood "right by the company storeroom, where the ammunition was kept."

"Q. What were they doing there?—A. Rood was in an argument with McMurray. He wanted to get into the storeroom and get some ammunition. He said he refused to go out there and be fired at without having anything to fire back, and the old sergeant said he would not open that door until I told him to.

"Q. The sergeant was standing guard over the door?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did you do?—A. After I checked the company and satisfied myself that with the men in line and with the men on guard, and the sick and the men on detached service, that the company was satisfactorily accounted for, then I ordered them to open up a brand-new box of ammunition and issued the ammunition to the company.

"Q. They went into the storeroom?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And brought out a case?—A. It was opened right in the room.

* * * * * * *

"Q. Why was it Artificer Rood was saying they had no ammunition, and he did not want to go out unless they had some ammunition.—A. As I remember it, C Company was the only company in the post that carried the guard ammunition. They issued ten rounds per man. I believe they had 650 rounds; I don't remember.

"Q. That was the reduced range ammunition?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. We have been calling it here—used only for guard purposes?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That is a cartridge, as we understand it, that has only about fifteen grains of powder in the shell, as against forty-two or forty-three?—A. Yes; and with a lead bullet.

"Q. And what kind of a bullet has it?—A. A lead bullet.

"Q. No steel jacket on it?—A. No, sir.

"Q. How far can they shoot that?—A. They are supposed to be effective 75 or 100 yards.

"Q. And the men were not satisfied to go out, or Mr. Rood was not, at any rate, with that kind of ammunition?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And what he wanted was the regular ball ammunition?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That is what you directed the quartermaster-sergeant to issue?—A. Yes, sir."

This testimony is quoted to show that men planning to go out and shoot up a hostile town for purposes of revenge would not be likely to supply themselves for such an occasion with an ammunition that they had no confidence in, even for purposes of defense such as they had in contemplation at the time when the occurrence happened about which Lieutenant Grier testified.

TESTIMONY OF LITTLEFIELD.

The testimony of Ambrose Littlefield is that from the mouth of the Cowen alley at Thirteenth street he looked up Thirteenth street 120 feet to the corner of Thirteenth and Washington streets and saw a party of raiders turning to the right from Thirteenth street on to Washington street, and that as they turned into Washington street they passed near a street lamp, and that as they were passing the street lamp one of the raiders turned and looked in the direction of the witness, and that the witness by the aid of the lamp at that distance from him could see that it was the face of a negro soldier. The testimony of this witness might be analyzed to show that it is unworthy of credit, but that is not necessary in view of the fact that he is completely contradicted by Mr. George Thomas Porter, who lived at the corner of Thirteenth and Washington streets and who testified that he was at his front window looking out at the very time mentioned by Littlefield, and that no men of any kind turned out of Thirteenth street into Washington street in the way described or were anywhere near the lamp under which Littlefield claims to have seen the soldier whom he pretends to have identified.

TESTIMONY OF DOMINGUEZ.

Lieutenant Dominguez, who was wounded, testified that from the corner of Washington and Fourteenth streets he looked down Fourteenth street to the Cowen alley and saw the raiders cross Fourteenth street, going northwardly in the alley toward the Miller House, and that he saw 8 of the raiders four abreast. The fact that he could not have any artificial light to aid him and does not pretend to have had any such help, is enough to discredit this statement. But Officer Padron testifies that he was at the corner of Washington and Fourteenth streets at the time when the raiders were firing on the Cowen house, and that he went from that point northwardly on Washington street to Thirteenth street, and that when about midway of the square he met Lieutenant Dominguez, and that Dominguez there alighted, tightened his saddle girth, remounted, and then went with Padron north on Washington street to Thirteenth, and that he was never nearer Fourteenth street than the point where he met him, which was, as stated, about the middle of the square.

The only other time when Dominguez claims to have seen the soldiers was when he was passing the mouth of the alley on Thirteenth street at the Miller Hotel. He testified that he passed the mouth of the alley in a fast trot, and that as he did pass the mouth of the alley he looked down it toward the garrison and saw at the distance of 25 or 30 feet soldiers coming up the alley toward Thirteenth street; that there were about 15 or 20 of them, and that they were about equally divided into two squads and that they were marching in single file and that these squads were on opposite sides of the alley. This alley was 20 feet in width. On one side at the line of the alley rose a two-story frame building and on the opposite side at the line of the alley rose a three-story brick building, the Miller Hotel. It was, therefore, impossible for Dominguez to look into the alley until he came opposite to it. At that time he was going in a fast trot. It would not take him more than a second, going at that rate of speed, to entirely pass the mouth of the alley. He testifies that he not only saw the soldiers and made the careful observations he minutely states, but that he saw a lady in the window of one of the upper stories of the hotel and warned some parties who appeared to be at the window, as well as others, of the danger that was coming. There was no light whatever in the alley, either at the point 30 feet from the mouth of it, where Dominguez claims to have seen soldiers, or at any other point. On that dark night looking down that alley between the houses that fronted on it in the way described there was nothing whatever to aid the vision. It was not only a dark night, but probably there was not a darker place in all Brownsville at that particular time than was that particular spot.

A fair consideration of these facts, about which there can be no serious dispute, compels the conclusion that it was impossible for Dominguez to have seen and noted with accuracy what he states.

EXPERT TESTIMONY AS TO EFFECT OF DARKNESS ON THE VISION.

On this point of inability to distinguish in the dark, attention is called to the following testimony as to the results of experiments made by certain officers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, none of them, however, belonging to either of the companies stationed at Brownsville:

(Page 1989):

Testimony of Second Lieut. James Blyth, U. S. Army.

Second Lieut. James Blyth, U. S. Army, being first duly sworn, testified as follows:

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Give us your name in full, Lieutenant.—A. James Blyth.

"Q. You are an officer in the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry?—A. Yes, sir; second lieutenant.

"Q. And have been how long?—A. Three years and four months.

"Q. Of what company?—A. Battalion quartermaster and commissary, third battalion.

"Q. Have you at any time been connected with any company?—A. Yes, sir; with K Company.

"Q. What rank have you in the Army?—A. Second lieutenant.

"Q. How long have you been in the Army altogether?—A. Eight years and seven months.

"Q. Are you a graduate of West Point?—A. No, sir.

"Q. You were appointed from civil life?—A. From the ranks.

"Q. Were you present at Fort McIntosh in February and March of this year, when certain experiments were made?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. As I understand, experiments of two kinds were made, some with respect to the power of vision at night and some with respect to the course of bullets?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. As to their deflection, and so forth?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Tell us first about the experiments made in February concerning the powers of vision at night. Were you present at those experiments?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Tell us who else were present?—A. Major O'Neil, Lieutenant Harbold, Lieutenant Elser, and a civilian by the name of Colonel Stucke.

"Q. You were the observers?—A. We were the observers; yes, sir.

"Q. Now, tell us who made the experiments, who conducted them?—A. Lieutenant Wiegenstein.

"Q. Is he an officer of the Twenty-fifth Infantry?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, go ahead and describe what that experiment was.—A. He arranged to have the men go down there at night. We did not know how he was going to conduct it at all. After everything was ready we went out at about half past 8 in the evening and stood on the edge of an arroyo. The men were down underneath. When the first volley was fired Major O'Neil shouted to him and asked him which way the men were facing. We could not tell. Lieutenant Wiegenstein laughed and said that was a part of the test, that he did not care to say. He wanted us to find out for ourselves.

"Then we moved down about 50 feet further, I should say, along the edge of the arroyo. Two more volleys were fired, and some fired at will, but all we could see was the flash of the rifle. We could not see the rifle that fired it.

"Q. Have you any memorandum that shows the distance at which you were making the observation?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Please produce the memorandum, and tell us how far the squad was away from you when the first firing which you have mentioned was done.—A. The first firing on the horizontal was 50 feet and 4 inches, and the vertical height was 21 feet and 2 inches.

"Q. That was which firing, the second or the first?—A. It was the first.

"Q. You were that far distant?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And at that distance could you distinguish the men?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Could you tell whether they were white men or negroes or Mexicans?—A. The light was not sufficient for us to tell which way they were facing even.

"Q. You could not even tell that?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Could you tell anything about the different articles of clothing they wore?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Was there a further firing?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Where did that take place? How far were you from them?—A. That was 24 feet on the horizontal and 20 feet and 7 inches above them. The results were the same.

"Q. Then was there another trial?—A. Yes, sir; we moved down then.

"Q. You moved down or they moved down?—A. We moved down to another place. That was 69 feet 2 inches away and 20 feet 5 inches above them; and looking almost into their faces, when the volleys were fired, all we could see was the flash, that was all.

"Q. You moved down or they moved down?—A. We moved down. We could see nothing but the flash.

"Q. And you could tell nothing about their clothes?—A. No, sir; we could not even see the rifles that were fired.

"Q. You could not even see the rifles?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Could not tell whether they were Krugs or Springfields or Winchesters or what?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Was there any other firing, still another test?—A. Yes sir; after that they marched down one arroyo and came up another almost directly underneath us in single file, but we failed to distinguish anyone, could not tell who they were at all. They were halted, then, underneath us, at that time 20 feet and 5 inches below and 18 feet and 7 inches from us. Then the flash of the rifles would come, and the eye would involuntarily close. The closer it got, the more the noise of the report and the flash of the rifle attracted your eye. Before you could take your eye away to look for anything else the light would disappear, so it was impossible to see anything.

"Q. Did you make any further tests?—A. Yes, sir; we brought the men up——

"By Senator WARNER:

"Q. In order to save time, because I do not care to cross-examine, I will ask this question: They were 22 feet below you?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And 18 feet from you?—A. Twenty feet 5 inches below us.

"Q. And how many feet from you?—A. Eighteen feet 7 inches.

"Q. From you?—A. Yes, sir; on a horizontal, and vertically 20 feet and 5 inches.

"By Senator OVERMAN:

"Q. From the bank to where they were?—A. We were standing on the bank and that was the distance measuring down.

"Q. The base of the triangle was 18 feet?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you did not measure the hypotenuse?—A. We did not measure that.

"By Senator SCOTT:

"Q. You were standing up here, as I understand it, and then over here [indicating]?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. The height here was 20 feet and 5 inches?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And the horizontal distance from here to here was how much?—A. Eighteen feet and 7 inches.

"By Senator WARNER:

"Q. You did not get the hypotenuse?—A. We did not get that.

"By Senator PETTUS:

"Q. Do you mean the diagonal distance, or what do you mean?—A. We measured the two sides of the triangle. We did not measure the hypotenuse. We did not figure that out.

"Q. You measured it with a tapeline?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Not with a common rule?—A. Oh, no.

"Q. A tapeline, or something of that kind?—A. A steel tapeline, and also with a clinometer.

"Q. You did not measure the hypotenuse?—A. No, sir.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. After these firings in the arroyo, what happened next?—A. We brought the men up on the bank—took them up on the road. The road was about 8 feet wide. We divided ourselves into two parties, one party on each side of the road. The moon was shining, and it was a clear, starlight night, so there was a good light. The men were marched past, in single file, between us, and we wanted to see if we could distinguish the features of the men. After they all passed by I asked Major O'Neil to have a number of white officers march past, so I could get the exact distance to us from them, to see if I would get the same impression that I did from the soldiers going by. Lieutenant Wiegenstein came back and laughed and said: 'Then you don't know that there are white men in the line?' I said: 'No; I did not know that.' So the detail was halted and I went up and scanned each man's face. We were about 2 feet from them at that time. I peered right into their faces, and I myself picked out one man who was a little lighter colored than the remainder, and he turned out to be a Mexican. The other men I did not distinguish at all. After we had passed he told me that there was a white man in the center of the line, and also a man who, I believe, was an Italian.

"Q. Did you have any further experiments?—A. That night, after the moon went down, we went out and had the same experiments.

"Q. With the same results?—A. And with the same results. The only difference was that after the moon went down, and at a greater distance—we were 69 feet and 2 inches away—when the rifles were fired by volley, what I saw was just a long line of legs with dark material. It seemed to be long trousers that the men had on, but after the experiment was over and they were brought up on the bank I found that they had on khaki breeches and leggings. So I received a false impression.

"Q. And you observed as closely as you could?—A. Yes, sir; we cautioned one another to watch. Not only that, but after the first volley was fired we cautioned one another to watch where the faces should be.

"Q. What interest had Colonel Stucke, if any, in that investigation?—A. None whatever; no interest at all. He was there as a guest of Major O'Neil to dinner and went out with us after dinner.

"Q. He is not connected in any way with the command?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Were you all of one mind as to the result of the investigation?—A. As far as it went. It was impossible to distinguish features by the flash of a rifle, or to distinguish color or complexion.

"Q. After nightfall, when the firing was in the dark?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you have any further experiments?—A. We had another one on the 11th of March at night. At that time Captain Lewis and Lieutenant Harbold and myself were the observers.

"Q. Was that of this same general nature?—A. Of the same nature as in the arroyo. After the firing in the arroyo we came up and went into my house, and went upstairs and looked out of two windows, 3 feet away, down, and the men were marched past underneath the windows, and we failed to recognize any features or any complexion. We could distinguish from the light shining out from my window on the first floor that they had on shirts made of dark material of some kind, and lighter trousers, but what they were we could not tell.

"Q. Yes.—A. Then they were moved around in front of the house and marched across the parade ground, and in rear of a light, and when they got about 60 feet away we were unable to see them. They disappeared entirely from view. They were brought back and marched between a street lamp and my porch—we were all sitting there—the distance being about 20 paces. We afterwards measured that. We did not recognize anyone. Then they were brought around, and right along on the sidewalk in front of the house, which is only 5 paces away, and at that distance we failed to recognize Lieutenant Wiegenstein, who was in the center. We did not know he was there. He was the only white man in the lot.

"Q. What was the character of the night? Was it an unusually dark night?—A. The stars were shining, and there was no moon.

"Q. The stars were shining, and no moon?—A. Yes, sir; with a street lamp only 20 paces away.

"Q. Now, if anyone were to say that looking out of a window of a dark night he or she saw a gun fired, and recognized by the flash of that gun, it being a high-power rifle such as you have in use, the face of a man as that a negro, and was able to detect that he had freckles on his face, what would you think of that kind of a statement, from your observation and experience?—A. I would not believe it.

"Q. You would not believe it?—A. No, sir.

"Q. And what would you believe of a statement of similar character, to the effect that by the flashes of rifles it could be determined whether the hats worn by the men shooting the rifles were black hats or gray hats, or whether they had cords around them or not?—A. With our rifles the experiments showed that the flash of a rifle was not sufficient to show you anything.

"Q. You could not tell what kind of a rifle it was, even?—A. No, sir; you could not even see the rifle that fired the shots.

"Q. So that if anyone who was looking out could see such things as I have indicated it was because they had better powers of observation than you had, or else they were mistaken in what they saw or observed?—A. Yes, sir; that is it."

Testimony of Maj. Joseph Patrick O'Neil, United States Army.

Maj. Joseph Patrick O'Neil, United States Army, being first duly sworn, testified as follows:

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Please give your name in full.—A. Joseph Patrick O'Neil.

"Q. You are in the military service of the United States, are you?—A. I am, sir.

"Q. What is your rank?—A. Major, Thirtieth Infantry.

"Q. You are now a major of the Thirtieth United States Infantry?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Where are you stationed?—A. Fort Logan H. Roots.

"Q. Were you formerly connected with the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry?—A. From the summer of 1891 until the 1st of February, 1907, I was an officer of the Twenty-fifth Infantry.

"Q. Sixteen years, about?—A. About sixteen years; yes, sir.

"Q. That is a pretty long service with one regiment. When were you transferred to the Thirtieth—when were you promoted to be major?—A. Yes, sir; when I was promoted to be a major; the vacancy was in the Thirtieth Infantry, and I went to that vacancy.

"Q. When was that?—A. The vacancy occurred on the 31st of January. I did not leave the Twenty-fifth Infantry until the 8th of March.

"Q. Of this year?—A. Of this year.

"Q. Until the 8th of March of this year, then, you had been with the Twenty-fifth Infantry ever since 1891?—A. Ever since 1891.

"Q. You were with the Twenty-fifth at Fort Niobrara?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And then what company were you connected with at that time?—A. At Fort Niobrara?

"Q. Yes.—A. Company M. I was commanding Company M, and the Third Battalion of the regiment.

"Q. Where did you go when your regiment left Fort Niobrara in July of last year?—A. We went to Fort McIntosh, Laredo, Tex.

"Q. You went there with Company M?—A. And the Third Battalion.

"Q. What other companies constituted that Third Battalion?—A. I, K, L, and M.

"Q. You were captain of M Company then?—A. I was captain of M Company.

"Q. And went with it to Fort McIntosh. You were not at Fort Brown at all?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Fort McIntosh is how far from Fort Brown?—A. I would simply have to make a guess, Senator.

"Q. Is it 40 or 50 miles?—A. It is between 150 and 200.

"Q. It is up at Laredo?—A. It is up at Laredo.

"Q. Fort Ringgold is between the two posts?—A. Between the two posts.

"Q. You were on the Rio Grande River at Fort McIntosh?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, Major, did you have anything to do with any experiments that were made at Fort McIntosh in February or March of this year with a view to ascertaining what the powers of vision were at night in identifying people and determining who they were?—A. Yes, sir; I ordered some experiments to be made, and the one about recognizing people I personally superintended.

"Q. Tell us when that experiment was made and by whom it was made, and what was the nature of it as nearly as you can.—A. It was near the last of February. I do not remember the exact date.

"Q. During the month of February. That will answer the present purposes. There is no controversy about the date. We will agree upon that. Where was this experiment made?—A. At Fort McIntosh.

"Q. Did you make more than one experiment?—A. Well, we made three altogether. I personally superintended only one.

"Q. And that was an experiment to determine what?—A. That was an experiment to determine how far you could recognize men at night, and what was the effect of the flash of our present rifle as to light up a man's face or prominent parts, so that you could distinguish him.

"Q. Did you participate in that experiment or did you simply play the part of an observer?—A. Well, I had the experiment conducted before me. I was observing the experiment.

"Q. Who conducted that experiment?—A. Well, Lieutenant Wiegenstein was present with the men; Lieutenant Blyth, I think Lieutenant Harbold—I do not remember now for sure—Lieutenant Elser, and Colonel Stucke, an electrical engineer.

"Q. With the exception of Colonel Stucke, an electrical engineer, the others whom you name were all officers of your battalion, were they not?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I understood you to say Lieutenant Wiegenstein conducted the experiment?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I wish you would tell us just what it was; the nature of it.—A. I directed Lieutenant Weigenstein to have a number of men, more than ten. I told him I wanted Mexicans and white men and negroes mixed up. I told him the reason I wanted it was that I saw an account of where a person had testified that he could recognize these people 70 or 80 feet away.

"Q. That was in the Penrose court-martial?—A. That was in the Penrose court-martial.

"Q. And that is what prompted you to have this experiment made, was it?—A. That was what prompted me to have this experiment made.

"Q. Now go on.—A. Well, he selected the men. I told him one or two men that I wanted put in, just mentioned casually that I thought they would be good men to put in. He went down into an arroyo——

"Q. Explain what an arroyo is. That is a new word with us.—A. An arroyo is a ravine. Generally its sides are perpendicular. That is the difference that we make between an arroyo and a ravine, although arroyo is the word usually used in all Mexican descriptions.

"Q. Just proceed.—A. He brought those men down into an arroyo, where we could get an approximate idea of distance—that is, the height of a man in a second story window, and the approximate distance, by standing on top of this arroyo and looking down, the approximate distance as testified.

"Q. Was this at night?—A. This was at night.

"Q. At about what hour?—A. The one that I attended was between 8 and 10 o'clock at night. It took us some time.

"Q. What kind of a night was it?—A. Well, the moon would have set about 12 o'clock. The night was so bright that one of the officers took a newspaper from his pocket and said, "Why, I can almost read this print.' I did not stay around close enough to ask him any further questions about it, but it was a particularly bright, clear night.

"Q. There was moonlight; was there also starlight?—A. Moonlight and bright starlight. I think there were about eleven men. They were lined up, and they wore khaki leggings, khaki trousers, and blue shirts. The first experiment—the distances I marked at the time. I do not remember what they were. If you would like the distances, I still have the notes that I made at the time.

"Q. Yes; you can look at your notes and give us the distances.—A. The distance in the first position—the distance of the squad from the officers—was 50 feet and 4 inches horizontally.

"Q. The officers who were observing?—A. Who were observing. That is the horizontal distance. The officers who were observing were 24 feet above the squad—that is, we were on top of the arroyo and the squad was down in the bottom of the arroyo. We were 24 feet above and 50 feet and 4 inches away from them. At the first experiment the men's backs were turned toward us. We did not know anything about what was going to be done. Lieutenant Wiegenstein did that entirely.

"Q. You knew the men were coming into the arroyo before you could see them?—A. We knew the men were coming into the arroyo. We were told that they were coming in and we were watching for them.

"Q. But you did not know which way they would front?—A. We did not know which way they would front, or anything about it. Well, at the first firing the men had their backs to us, and they fired 20 or 30 shots. They fired by file and they fired by volley. The only way that I could distinguish that their backs were toward us was by the flashes of the rifles going away from us. Then I asked a question. I said: 'Mr. Wiegenstein, haven't you got them faced the wrong way?' That I understood afterwards was a part of the experiment, but I recognized from the flash of the rifles. I expected the flash of the rifle to come toward me, and instead of that it went away from me. The next position the distance was 68 feet and 7 inches. The men's faces were toward us. We could not distinguish anything in their faces any more than we could before.

"Q. In the first case could you tell anything more than that the men were there at the place where the firing was? Could you tell how they were dressed or who they were?—A. No, sir. I felt that they had on khaki trousers and leggings. I was not exactly sure of the kind of coat they had on. The only reason that I remember this is that I asked Mr. Wiegenstein, 'What kind of coats have they on?' He said, 'They have blue shirts.' I ordered him to go back and change and get into khaki coats, but the light did not show distinctly enough to tell whether they had their khaki coats on or blue shirts. Further than that, Mr. Wiegenstein was in olive-drab uniform. He had on a standing white collar, which came up about an inch above the collar of his coat. He had on his saber. I recognized him distinctly when he was under me, or some distance away while he was marching, walking up toward me or talking to me. When he got down into the squad I looked particularly to find him, and I could not distinguish him in the squad.

"Q. Although he had on a white collar and a saber?—A. Although he had on a white collar and a saber.

"Q. Did you look for him at the time when the guns were flashing?—A. I did not look for him particularly at that time. It was after the first firing that I thought I would look to see whether I could distinguish him. At first my attention was entirely given up to trying to distinguish particularly the individual men in the squad.

"Q. Could you distinguish any of the individual men?—A. No, sir. There was in the squad a man who had worked for me and worked in my house for six months or more, brushed my shoes, and coming to the door and looking after me. I knew him as well, if not better, than any man in the command. I tried particularly to see if I could distinguish him, but I could not distinguish anyone. There were three of those experiments, but in the last one we moved up until we were 24 feet above them.

"Q. Before you get away from the first one, you said you had white men and Mexicans and negroes. Could you distinguish the Mexicans from the others?—A. No; I could not distinguish.

"Q. Could you distinguish the white men from the others?—A. No; I could not distinguish any of them.

"Q. You could not distinguish mulattoes or negroes?—A. You could not tell who they were down there. They might have been anything in color. It was absolutely impossible to distinguish them.

"Q. What kind of hats or caps did your men wear?—A. They wore the campaign hat.

"Q. Could you tell what kind of hat they had on?—A. I don't remember whether it was—no, sir; we could not distinguish. We did not distinguish the hats until they passed in review.

"Q. Now go to the second experiment. The one I have been asking you about, the first one, was where they had their backs to you, when you had expected them to front toward you, as I understand?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How far away were they?—A. At that time they were 68 feet 7 inches.

"Q. What was the result of that—similar to the others?—A. Exactly the same. We could not distinguish anything about them at all.

"Q. Now, what was the third experiment?—A. After those two experiments, then I spoke to Mr. Wiegenstein about the coats—that I wanted the khaki coat worn. So he marched the men out of the arroyo and called out this particular man, that I would have known almost any place, told him to go up and get a khaki coat, and I changed the order and told him to have all of them in their khaki coats. Then they came back and went through their third experiment. At that time we were at about the same height, 24 feet above, and the horizontal distance was 18 feet 7 inches.

"Q. They were that close to you?—A. They were that close.

"Q. If they had been on a level?—A. If they had been on a level they would have been 18 feet 7 inches away. They were in khaki. They had campaign hats on. That we knew. I saw them marching out of the arroyo to go up and get their khaki coats. They went through the same experiment. I think in that experiment they fired a great many more shots that they had in either one of the two, probably more than they did in the first two together. That was the particular point where I tried to recognize Lieutenant Wiegenstein and I could not. That was at a horizontal distance of 18 feet 7 inches.

"Q. You measured these distances afterwards, did you?—A. Yes, sir. These distances were measured with a steel tape—an engineer's tape.

"Q. Could you tell the white men from the Mexicans or Mexicans from the negroes?—A. No, sir; you could not tell the white men from Mexicans. You could not tell anything about them at all.

"Q. Could you tell how they were uniformed, how they were dressed?—A. The test was hardly fair for me, then, because I thought that I recognized khaki trousers and khaki leggings. The upper part I could not recognize anything about at all. I could not tell whether they had on a khaki coat or not, but I thought that I recognized khaki leggings and khaki trousers. I knew that they had the khaki trousers and khaki leggings, and I was looking particularly to find it out.

"Q. What about their faces when the guns were fired? Did the flash light up their faces so you could distinguish them?—A. At the flash of the rifle you could not distinguish anything. This rifle has such a vivid flash that the eye does not take in anything except the flash. At times your eye might run to the shoulder or to the arm. It might take in that much, but when the flash of the rifle goes off all that you see is the flash. It is nothing like the black powder and nothing like the shotgun flash.

"Q. These were Springfield rifles and smokeless powder?—A. Springfield rifles and smokeless powder.

"Q. Your regular ball ammunition?—A. Regular ball ammunition.

"Q. Then you could not tell whether a man in the line there had freckles on his face or not?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Could you tell what kind of a gun he had in his hand?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Could you tell whether it had a blue barrel or whether the barrel was covered with wood?—A. That, I believe, was absolutely impossible.

"Q. I ask you these questions only because of these things having been testified about. You were there for the express purpose of making observations?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You were looking to see what you could in the way of detecting these things?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And that was not a dark night?—A. No, sir; that was a very bright moonlight night.

"Q. What did the men do after that?—A. After they finished the shooting I directed Lieutenant Wiegenstein to march them up the road, and the spectators or the witnesses stood about 5 feet away. The men marched by us and they would have gotten by us if I had not known—if I was just taking a cursory glance I would not then have noticed any difference in the men; but when they had passed I said, 'Halt that squad, Mr. Wiegenstein. I thought I told you to put in some Mexicans and white men,' and he said, 'I did, sir.' Then we went and walked down the line. There were two men that I thought might have been white men. Then I walked down the line to examine it, and the only man that I picked out was an Italian who had been working in the blacksmith shop, out of the sun. He had a sort of waxy, yellowish complexion; nothing like a mulatto. The white man was in the center of the squad, and he passed me, and I knew he was there. I had specially ordered him out, and I did not recognize him until I halted the line and went up and looked into each individual's face.

"Q. And you were only 5 feet away from them as they marched by?—A. It could not have been more than 6 feet.

"Q. May have been less than 6?—A. It possibly was less.

"Q. It was close, they were marched right by you, and you knew that they had white men and black men and Mexicans in that company, and you were looking to detect the white men?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And the Mexicans?—A. Yes, sir.

"By Senator OVERMAN:

"Q. How was the moon at that time?—A. The moon would have set at 12 o'clock that night. The moon was not full, but was very large and very bright; a very clear night. Of course these men were marching through the chaparral. The chaparral brush down there—the mesquite brush—would probably grow 2 feet above the men's heads, but they were marching on a road that was as wide as from here to the wall. They were in the wagon track. That is, they were marched through a cutting in the clearing. It was not used very much as a road. There was an old cart used to go down there, I think, at times, but they were in the wagon track, right in the moonlight. The chaparral may have cast some shadow, but not enough——

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Where did you stand—in the chaparral at the side of the road?—A. I stood in the chaparral at the side of the road.

"Q. And they were on a level with you as they passed by?—A. They were on a level with us.

"Q. And there was no chaparral on the road where they marched?—A. The chaparral was on either side of the road.

"Q. And the road was as wide as over to the wall?—A. That was the main road where they were marching.

"Q. Twelve or 15 feet wide?—A. I may have overestimated the distance. It could not have been over 10 feet wide.

"Q. All right, 10 feet wide.—A. It would not be more than 10 feet wide.

"Q. And the chaparral, you think, might have been as much as 2 feet higher than the heads of the men?—A. As much at 2 feet higher than the heads of the men.

"Q. Was the moon high or low?—A. The moon was high.

"Q. It would not cast much of a shadow over the heads of the men, would it?—A. It cast no shadow. In thinking over the experiment, the men were between the moon and me. Now, if the men had had their hats off I do not believe there would have been any difficulty in distinguishing them at all. I think that they were under the shadow of their hats, and they were marched by at what we call "quick time." They were going 120 steps to the minute and 30 inches to the step.

"Q. When they were halted and you went along the line, then you could pick out these different men?—A. Then we picked out the different men.

"Q. How many observers were there in your company who had the same experience?—A. I don't remember whether Lieutenant Harbold was there or not. I do remember Lieutenant Blythe and Lieutenant Elser and Colonel Stucke.

"Q. Colonel Stucke was not in the Army?—A. Not in the Army. I was anxious to have him out there because he is an electrical engineer, and I asked him some pertinent questions at the time.

"Q. Then did you experiment further that night or did that close the experiment?—A. Well, as the moon was so bright and the night was so bright that it did not correspond to the conditions at Brownsville, I ordered them to have the experiment after 12 o'clock, or after the moon went down. I know they had the experiment after that, but I did not attend it."

Testimony of Second Lieut. Robert Pattison Harbold, United States Army.

Second Lieut. Robert Pattison Harbold, United States Army, being first duly sworn, testified as follows:

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Lieutenant, tell us whether or not you ever witnessed any experiments recently made at Fort McIntosh with a view to determining the powers of vision in the nighttime as to detecting men who were firing such arms as you were equipped with?—A. Yes, sir; on the night of February 18–19 of this year we made our first experiment at Fort McIntosh to get visual tests, and on the night of March 11 we made another experiment.

"Q. Now, go back and tell us about the first experiments, taking them up in their chronological order.—A. In the first experiment we began the experiment about half past 9 in the evening.

"Q. What kind of a night was it?—A. It was a bright moonlight night, the moon being about two hours high—that is, about two hours from down. The light was sufficient so that I could take a typewritten letter and study out the words and make out the letter. The experiment consisted in having a squad of men, of about 10, I think, placed in an arroyo, so that they would be about 22 feet below us, and at different points ranging from 200 feet as the maximum to 15 feet as the minimum on the horizontal from us. The composition of this squad was unknown to me at the time, as Lieutenant Wiegenstein, of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, arranged the squad and the details of the firing.

"At the first firing we were in rear of the men and above them at about 200 feet, I should say, in rear. At this distance the men could not be distinguished. The only thing that we could see would be a line, indicating that the men were there. It was impossible to tell in which direction the men were facing, and only when they fired could we determine this, as by the flash we could tell that the men were behind the flash, and then there would be firing away from us by them. The light of the flash was not sufficient to determine anything at all. The flash was instantaneous. Although we were trying to concentrate our eyes on the men and looked for features, the flash would draw the eye away involuntarily, and as it was instantaneous, nothing whatever could be seen; nothing of the rifle could be seen, and the articles of dress could not be distinguished. As far as complexion was concerned, why nothing could be seen. Even the face could not be made out.

"Q. Could you tell what kinds of hats they had on?—A. Not at that distance.

"Q. Whether black or gray?—A. No, sir; we could not.

"Q. Could you tell whether they had hat cords around their hats?—A. No, sir; we could not. I would not have been able to tell whether the men had hats on or not at that distance.

"Q. That is 200 feet away?—A. Yes, sir; approximately 200 feet, as far as I know, although the distance was actually measured, and Lieutenant Wiegenstein has the actual measurements of the positions.

"Q. Let me ask you there, Lieutenant Wiegenstein is still ill, is he?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Is he here in this city?—A. Yes, sir; he is in the general hospital.

"Q. Do you think we can expect him to be able to testify to-morrow?—A. I think so, sir.

"Q. Proceed then. That was the first firing, about 200 feet away from you?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And 22 or 23 feet below you?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Where did they fire again, if at all?—A. Then we changed our position and went around the head of the arroyo, so that we got directly opposite and on the flank of the squad. They were then, I should say, about 50 feet from us—that is, we were 50 feet on their flank. The results there were the same, although the line of men could be made out a little better than perviously, but features and articles of dress could not be recognized or distinguished. The complexions it was absolutely impossible to tell, whether the men were white or black, although we presumed that all the men were negro soldiers.

"Q. How many men were present with you observing this experiment as you were?—A. At this time Major O'Neil, of the Thirtieth Infantry, was there; Lieutenant Blyth, of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, was there, and a civilian by the name of Stucke, a civil engineer up at Laredo, Tex.

"Q. Was Lieutenant Elser there?—A. Lieutenant Elser was not at the first experiment.

"Q. Very well, I only want to get how many.—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You have told us what your experience was as to making observations. Do you know whether or not all the others who were present with you as observers had the same experience?—A. From what they said, they did; they all had identically the same experience.

"Q. Did anyone claim to be able to recognize any individual—to tell whether he was white or black or Mexican?—A. No, sir; not at this time; we could not tell anything about them.

"Q. Did anyone claim to be able to recognize what kind of hats they had on, and whether they had hat cords on?—A. No, sir; not in this position; but I should like to state that from this position the men were then filed over through a hogback in the arroyo and got directly underneath us, so that the man on the left flank, which was toward us, was not more than 5 feet away from us on the horizontal, although we were about 22 feet above him. In this position we could distinguish light from dark clothing, and hats could be distinguished; that is, we could tell that the men had some head gear on, although whether it was a campaign hat, a sombrero, or any of the soft hats that are common in that community, we could not tell. There was an officer with the command. We could distinguish him by the flash of his saber, and I presumed that it was Lieutenant Wiegenstein, because he had arranged the battalion and had taken his squad out. When the men were firing the results were practically the same. The flash of the rifle was not sufficient and of not long enough duration to obtain any view of the men.

"Q. Is your vision normal?—A. My vision is normal, and I think it is rather acute.

"Q. Well, now, was there any further firing or any further opportunity to observe on that experiment?—A. Well, this firing began at half past 9, and as the moon was up we wished to test it with no moon.

"Q. Let me ask you before I forget about it, Was there any attempt to count the shots that were fired?—A. Well, we tried to estimate, as the firing was first by volley and then at will, and we estimated the number of shots. I estimated that about 40 shots had been fired. Later on Lieutenant Wiegenstein, who had actual count of the cartridges, told me, I think, that there were eighty-some shots fired.

"Now, another part of the test that we made at this first experiment, the men were then marched out of the arroyo and came up and above and alongside by us. I stationed myself on one side of them and Lieutenant Blyth on the other, and the moon was shining directly on the men, over my shoulder, and when they went by I was about 5 feet from the men. I studied them carefully, looked at them intently, and there were two men who I thought were men of my company, who were, I presumed, mulattoes, but I thought they were men of my company and called them by name. All the others I thought were negro soldiers, and when the men went by Lieutenant Blyth said that he would like to have some white men go by, so as to get the difference or the distinction in the complexions in that light. Major O'Neil then said that there were some white men in the detachment. The men were then halted when they got by and faced outward, and we walked along the line and studied the men carefully; looked at them intently; got face to face. The man at the rear of the company, who I thought was a mulatto, I found was an Italian, an assistant blacksmith at the post. He is rather pale, and does not have the bronzed, ruddy complexion of the white people in that community. The man at the head of the company that I thought was another mulatto in my company, I found to be a Mexican, whom I picked out when I got right up on him; recognized him by the mustache that he had. He was a driver in the quartermaster's department, and I was in contact with him daily and knew him very well by sight. I missed, in the middle of the detachment, the white man that was there. This white man is an ex-soldier of the Twenty-sixth Infantry, a man by the name of Bradbury, employed by the quartermaster's department as a driver. He is a very good specimen of the white men in that community, bronzed and ruddy, and undoubtedly he would not be mistaken for a mulatto or a Mexican. I walked by him and did not find him until one of the officers told me that there was a white man there, and then I went back and looked at each man as closely as possible, and then I found this man and called him by name. I said, 'This is Bradbury.'

"Q. And that was a moonlight night?—A. Yes, sir; that was a moonlight night.

"Q. Did that end the experiment for that night?—A. That ended it for that time. Then we waited until the moon had gone down, and about 1 o'clock in the morning we made some experiments without the moon. We then found that flash of the rifles was a little greater, that they lighted up better, but the duration was not long enough to obtain any view of the features or complexion. All that I could get by the flash of the rifles at this time was that I could see the hips of the men—the legs. I could not see above that; saw nothing of the rifle whatever, and I could not see below the knees."

The testimony of these officers should not need any corroboration, but it is easy for anyone to experiment for himself any night by simply making an effort to recognize individuals or their clothing, and to determine whether the individuals are white or black, or how, with any degree of accuracy, they may be dressed. Anyone who makes this effort will be astonished to find how impossible it is to see with distinctness unless aided by artificial light. No matter what the character of the night may be he will be thoroughly satisfied that reliable recognitions at the distance of 30 to 100 feet are simply impossible.

COURSE OF BULLETS.

Much prominence has been given to the testimony of Major Blocksom and others that the course of certain bullets after they struck the houses into which they were shot that night indicated that they were fired from the upper porch of B barracks.

Lieut. H. G. Leckie, of the Twenty-sixth Infantry, who had no interest whatever in this controversy, was sent by General McCaskey to Brownsville to make an examination and report as to various matters upon which specific and reliable information was desired in the Penrose court-martial, says that he examined the courses of these same bullets, with the result that he does not agree with Major Blocksom that they show that they were fired from B barracks or from any other point within the reservation. His statement on this point is that the bullets could not have been fired from B barracks unless they changed their course while in the air, which could not have occurred. His exact language is as follows:

(Page 3222, Senate Hearings):

"By Senator WARNER:

"Q. Now, you were asked the question by Senator FORAKER in your direct examination whether or not those bullets that entered the Yturria House could have been fired from barracks B?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You thought they could not?—A. I do not think they could. The reason that I say that they were not fired from B barracks is that they would have had to turn an angle of 90 degrees in the air, without anything to deflect them in any way; and I do not know of any laws of motion for a bullet doing that."

In other words, as he sighted along the courses of the bullets his eye did not go to the upper porch of B barracks or to any other point of the barracks. The result of this testimony is a flat contradiction as to what the courses of the bullets actually indicate; but aside from this contradiction this testimony is even less reliable, if that be possible, than the testimony of the so-called "eyewitnesses" who saw in the dark.

There is much testimony to support this proposition. It is enough to cite only one witness.

Lieut. R. P. Harbold testified, at page 1870 et seq., as follows:

"Q. Tell what other experiments, if any, you made or saw made.—A. I made experiments with the Krag-Jörgensen rifle, the Springfield rifle, and the Winchester .30-40 rifle, to get the penetration and the deflection of the different bullets from those rifles.

"Q. Let me ask you what you mean by a .30-40 Winchester?—A. The Winchester .30-40 is .30 caliber, and the 40 refers to the chamber, meaning that the chamber is longer than the .30-30. The .30-40 is the Winchester rifle that will shoot the Krag-Jörgensen ammunition. The .30-30 will not shoot it.

"Q. Does that refer to the number of grains of powder in the cartridge?—A. Not that one. The Winchester .30-220, which shoots our Springfield ammunition, means a Winchester with thirty one-hundredths of an inch caliber and 220 grains of powder.

"Q. A 220-grain bullet, you mean?—A. No, sir; powder of 220 grains.

"Q. The official instructions issued by the War Department show that the bullet of the Springfield and the bullet of the Krag weigh 220 grains, and that the powder is 42 or 43 grains. I call your attention to that.—A. Yes, sir; I recall that. That is right.

"Q. It has reference, then, to the bullet?—A. Yes, sir; it has reference to the bullet; it is called .30-220. That means that the bullet is thirty one-hundredths of an inch in diameter and that it weighs 220 grains.

"Q. When was it and where was it you made this experiment, and how came you to make this experiment?—A. The dates of these experiments were on the boxes which had the exhibits before the court-martial. Those exhibits have been taken from me, and I do not have them, but I made the experiments at Fort McIntosh. I also went out to a small place near there, about 5 miles from there, a place called Nye, where I could get longer ranges. I made my experiments there at about 200 yards.

"Q. What did these experiments consist of? First, who participated with you in making them?—A. At the post Lieutenant Blyth and Lieutenant Wiegenstein assisted me. My experiments at Nye were conducted by myself.

"Q. Proceed and tell us about them.—A. At Fort McIntosh our experiments were made by arranging targets first and firing into those targets, beginning at 200 yards and coming down to 40 feet; at 200 and 100 and 50 yards, and then at 80 feet and 40 feet. In these experiments we found that it was a general rule that all bullets were deflected after passing through the first material. The rule of deflection could not be determined. It was irregular, as one time it would be deflected to the right, another time would be deflected to the left, and then one would be deflected upward, and another deflected downward. We could not get a general rule as to the direction of deflection; but the only general rule we could get was that the bullets would be deflected. We could not obtain the penetration of the bullets in wood, as at no time could we capture a bullet in our wooden targets. We could put a box of sand behind the target and get the bullets, but we had an actual penetration of 18 inches of wood, and the bullet passed on through. This was at 40 feet. This wood consisted of 4 inches of ordinary red pine, and then we had back of this as a back stop a 2-inch hemlock plank, and the interior targets were 1 inch of white pine, about 8 inches apart; but the deflection was always so great in those cases that it was very seldom we could get our bullets to travel through the entire length of the target.

"Q. What was the area of that target?—A. About 12 inches in width, and they were placed in line, and the firer of course was in direct line.

"Q. How high were they?—A. They were about 5½ feet high, and we fired low, so that we would have a very good target in the vertical, although in the horizontal it was only about 10 inches.

"Q. I do not know whether I understand that exactly. Assuming that this target is 5½ feet high, that is what you mean?—A. We would fire low into the target. That is, we would not fire up at the top. We would make our bull's-eye down low. We would have to change it, but we got it low.

"Q. How high from the ground?—A. We put it from 8 inches up to about 3½ feet.

"Q. You experimented at all those different points?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What was the result of the deflection? How much was the deflection? First, let me ask you, assuming that this is the first target, do I understand that there was another target right behind it?—A. Yes, sir; there was another target right behind it, and so on.

"Q. And so on back?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How many did you have there?—A. We were changing them constantly, and at one time we had 18 inches of actual wood to be penetrated.

"Q. That would be quite a number of those different targets.—A. Yes, sir. I would like to state that we made another target alongside of that. The first target I am describing now was of oil boxes, such as we have at the post, and our second target consisted of 1-inch red pine. Two pieces were taken, about 8 inches apart. Then 12 feet in rear of that we put two more pieces 8 inches apart, and then 12 feet in rear of that two more pieces 8 inches apart. This was to give us, as nearly as we could get at it, the walls of a house with two rooms, and the deflections in the red pine were just the same as in the white-pine oil boxes.

"Q. Describe the deflections. Give us the extent to which they occurred.—A. Well, taking the second target of red pine, two boards placed then 12 feet in the rear, and then two more, one illustration was a triangle. The shots were fired so that the three bullet holes on the first board were about an inch apart—that is, they formed the two legs of a triangle in that way, about an inch apart. On the second board, or the second partition, which would be the wall of the second room, they had changed very much and had gone from 8 to 6 inches apart. Then on the third one of the bullets had left the target entirely, and the other two were about 12 inches apart. Notes were taken of all these things, I should like to state, and the triangles were measured, and Lieutenant Blyth has those notes in his possession. Then there was another experiment made there in which the deflection was about 8 feet to the left in a distance of 30 feet on the ground, and this was actually measured and taken with a steel tape and notes recorded.

"Q. Do you mean that the bullet struck the ground?—A. I mean that it struck the target and was deflected to the left, and it struck the ground over there, and the point where it struck the ground was marked. Then, of course, we plotted the triangle and got the deflection to the left and the distance to the ground.

"Q. Was it fired squarely at the target?—A. All the shots were fired squarely at the target.

"Q. And if it was not deflected it ought to have gone straight through?—A. Yes, sir; if it had not been deflected it should have gone straight through.

"Q. But it was deflected so much that at a distance of 30 feet——A. At a distance of 40 feet. We fired at a distance of 40 feet from the first target, but within 30 feet it had gone to the left about 8 or 9 feet.

"Q. I mean 30 feet from where it struck the target it deflected 8 or 9 feet?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And struck the ground?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I will ask you whether or not all your experiments show practically the same kind of results as to deflection?—A. Yes, sir; every experiment did.

"Q. How about going downward, when they would strike, or upward?—A. We had a number of illustrations where the bullets would go up or down in the trajectory.

"Q. The same bullet?—A. Yes, sir; the same bullet. I would like to describe to you one illustration that we had. Some of the bullets were fired between two oil boxes, so that we could hit the cracks between them, and it struck between and then went down in the board underneath. Instead of going through that board it just burrowed and kept right along the board for about 6 inches. Then it came up and entered the board of the top oil box, kept along that board for about 6 inches; then it went down again, and just described that wavy motion right along between the oil boxes.

"Q. Up and down?—A. Up and down; just a wavy motion, striking first one and then the other.

"Q. Plowing a furrow first in one box and then in the other?—A. There was no furrow. It would go in and keep in that inch board for about 6 inches, and then go into the other inch board and keep in that. Then we had another one where that same course was described, and then on one oil box it went along the wood and made an arc of about 90° to the left and left a complete furrow that looked like a quadrant right on the box.

"Q. How big was that arc?—A. It was a quadrant, 90°, approximately.

"Q. State whether or not in any of these experiments you found a bullet to have turned around when it struck into the partitions or boards.—A. Yes, sir; there was.

"Q. Butt end uppermost?—A. There was one bullet that we extracted in which the base was stuck in the box, and the point of the bullet was pointed toward the firing point, but this bullet had gone through several thicknesses of wood—that is, through several oil boxes—and then struck the sand in rear and turned completely round, and the base buried itself in the far side of the box.

"Q. But you did find it sticking into the wood?—A. Yes, sir; sticking into the wood.

"Q. So that the bullet in its flight had gone through all these partitions or boxes, whatever they were, all these obstructions?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And had turned clear around?—A. Yes, sir. And I should like to state that in following the trajectory through our different targets, oftentimes the first target would show a complete penetration. Then the bullet would turn, it would tumble, and the bullet would probably go lengthwise through the second target.

"Q. That is, go sidewise?—A. Yes, sir; it would turn and go sidewise, so that we would have a complete vertical diagram of the bullet there. Then on the next target it would take another direction; probably it would turn facing the other way, showing that the bullet was rotating and tumbling throughout the entire trajectory.

"Q. Now, tell us whether or not, as a result of your observations and experiments, it would be possible to get an accurate alignment of different holes made by bullets in different walls, so as to sight along and see at what point that bullet had been fired.—A. From my experiments it would not be possible to take one hole. For instance, it would be absolutely impossible to determine the firing point. It would be the same as trying to fire a gun by using only the front sight. It would be impossible to get any results. In taking two holes, where the deflection we proved was always very irregular and the third point, the firing point, could not be accurately located by means of the two holes. Taking the groove, it would be absolutely impossible to sight along the groove and determine the firing point. We found, taking the grooves which were made on the different boxes, taking the bullet holes, the eye could not with accuracy look along there and locate a definite point. At one time we sighted through a groove to locate the firing point. We would go away and go back and look along the groove, and we would locate another point; and within a horizontal distance of about 300 yards this variation in both the horizontal and the vertical would reach as much as a hundred yards.

"Q. The variation would reach a hundred yards?—A. Yes, sir. Now, we determined this by looking through this groove about 300 yards at a building and a high water tower, and taking different sights through this groove we could locate the top of the water tower or we could locate the roof of the building or we could locate a point on the ground.

"Q. And they were approximately a hundred yards apart?—A. Approximately a hundred yards apart; yes, sir.

"Q. You could locate the top of the tower or strike the ground with the eye?—A. Strike a point on the ground with the eye.

"Q. Or you could strike a point——A. To the right or left of that.

"Q. Varying a hundred yards?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In a distance of 300?—A. In a distance of about 300 yards; yes, sir.

"Q. Have you completed your story of these experiments which you made, or is there anything else connected with it?—A. My other experiments were merely to determine what ammunition the various rifles would fire.

"Q. I want to examine you about that, but first I will ask you what, according to your experience and observation, is the cause of the deflection of one of these high-power bullets?—A. The first thickness of the material in the target from which the deflections were made was 1 inch of white pine, and from my experiments I would say that any material would cause a deflection, no matter what thickness it would be, although if it were very thin the deflection would not be so great.

"Q. The deflection depends upon just the direction in which the point or nose of the bullet happens to be turned when it strikes the obstruction?—A. Yes, sir; and I also think it depends upon the material. If the material is very nearly homogeneous the deflection will not be great, and I think that the bullet will always follow the line of least resistance, pick it out and follow it, and that causes the deflection.

"Q. Your testimony amounts to this, as I understand it, that when a bullet strikes a house, for instance, it may go to the right or go to the left, or go up or go down?—A. Yes, sir."

A prominent law writer sends the following as a quotation from the opinion of Judge Lumpkin in Hart v. Powell (18 Ga., p. 635–42):

"It is related by Doctor Hennen as having occurred to a friend of his in the Mediterranean, that a ball which struck about the pomum adami, traveled completely round the neck and was found lying in the very orifice at which it had entered. The same author states that in one instance which occurred to a soldier, who having his arm extended in the act of endeavoring to climb up a scaling ladder, had the center of his shoulder pierced by a ball, which immediately passed along the limb and over the posterior part of the thorax, coursed along the abdominal muscles, dipped deep through the hypogastric artery, and presented itself in the forepart of the opposite thigh, about midway down.

"Now, we have often heard of an individual being 'shot all to pieces,' but never before by one ball. Who would have doubted—what adept in the science would not have testified—that this poor fellow had been shot a half dozen times?

"In another case, a ball which struck the breast of a man standing erect in the ranks lodged in the scrotum. The gallant and ever to be lamented Colonel Craig was shot in the back at Cerro Gordo; the ball pursued a circuitous route around his body, on the outside of the skin, to the breast.

"But we forbear to multiply examples. We are sustained by the highest medical authority in asserting that balls take very unusual courses, 'not at all to be accounted for by any preconceived theories drawn from the doctrine of projectiles, not to be explained by any diagrams formed upon mathematical rules.' (Med. Jour. by J. H. Paris, Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and Q. S. M. Fonblanque, esq., Barrister at Law, 2 vol. 126.) 'These considerations,' continue the learned authors, 'ought to render the surgeon very cautious how he delivers his opinion as to the direction the shot was fired.'"

THE SHELLS, CLIPS, ETC.

A lot of exploded cartridge shells, some clips and cartridges, and a bandoleer were picked up in the alleys and streets of Brownsville the next morning after the shooting.

Until these were brought to the fort and shown to Major Penrose and the other officers of the battalion they would not, any of them, believe it possible that any of the men of the battalion had been engaged in the shooting, but when these were exhibited to them, and they were told that they were picked up at the points where the shooting occurred, they changed their minds and concluded that in view of such evidence their men must have done the shooting. From that moment they put their men under the strictest scrutiny and surveillance and made every effort possible to ascertain who the guilty men were, but all such efforts failed.

In the meanwhile the court-martial of Major Penrose was held at San Antonio and the investigation before the Senate committee commenced. The testimony so taken satisfied the officers, as we have already pointed out, that their men were not guilty, and they have so testified.

They testify that they were influenced to change their opinions and reach the conclusion that their men were not guilty by a number of facts developed, including, among others, the results of a microscopic examination that was made of the exploded shells that were picked up in the streets of Brownsville. In other words, the testimony by which they had been first led to believe that their men were guilty turned out, as a result of this investigation, to be conclusive proof to their minds that their men were not guilty. The part this testimony has thus played shows that it is sufficiently important to receive special consideration.

NUMBER OF SHELLS FOUND.

1. According to the weight of the testimony there were from 150 to 300 shots fired that night in Brownsville by the raiders, whoever they may have been. There should have been found, therefore, that many exploded shells. The testimony shows that careful search was made to find the shells and every other species of evidence that might tend to show that the soldiers were guilty, but with the result that, all told, only about 40 of these exploded shells were found. In other words, there were from 100 to 200 or 300 exploded shells, according to the theory of those who claim that the soldiers did the firing, scattered somewhere as a result of that firing in the alleys and the streets of Brownsville which have never been found. Nobody pretends that there was any difficulty on account of the nature of the ground or for any other reason about finding any exploded shells there may have been, or ought to have been, in the streets where the firing occurred. Seven of these empty shells were found at the mouth of the Cowen alley near the fort by Captain Macklin. Others were found in the alley and in Washington street at the point where the firing is said to have occurred. These shells so found, except those found by Captain Macklin, were turned over to the authorities and subsequently forwarded to the Senate for use as evidence. There were only 33 of them in all. There may possibly have been a few others picked up that were not turned over, but we have no account of them and the testimony is of such character as to warrant the conclusion that there could have been but very few, if any, picked up in addition to the 33 mentioned. It is reasonable to conclude that the other shells that must have been exploded, if there were as many shots fired as the witnesses state, were not found to be such shells as the soldiers used, or there must have been some other good reason for not submitting them as evidence. Whatever the explanation may be, the fact remains, and it is a fact, that in and of itself discredits the deductions drawn to the prejudice of the soldiers from the finding of the shells that have been submitted.

SHELLS AND CLIPS FOUND BY CAPTAIN MACKLIN.

It is testified by Captain Macklin, who was the officer of the day, that just at the break of dawn he made a careful search for any evidence that would show who had done the firing. In this behalf he searched, both inside the reservation wall and outside, to find shells and clips or other evidence that the soldiers had done the firing as the citizens were at that time charging. He found no shell, no clip, no evidence of any kind inside the reservation wall, but outside the wall, across the street, in front of the garrison and at the mouth of Cowen alley, where according to the testimony of the guard and the scavenger and other witnesses the first shots were heard, he found 7 shells and 6 clips in a circular area not more than 10 inches in diameter. The testimony is conclusive that if these shells had fallen from Springfield rifles as they were fired they would have been scattered over an area perhaps 10 feet in diameter. It is the opinion of all the witnesses who testified on that point that the shells found by Captain Macklin could not have fallen in the position in which he found them if they had fallen as they were fired. This fact coupled with the further fact that with these 7 shells there were found 6 clips, enough to hold 30 cartridges, further discredits the finding of the shells in the alleys and streets as evidence of the guilt of the soldiers.

MICROSCOPIC INVESTIGATION.

But while the investigation was in progress the War Department on its own motion caused all the rifles that were in the hands of the three companies at Brownsville that night to be forwarded to the Springfield Armory, and detailed two officers, who, under instructions from the War Department, caused to be fired out of each of these rifles two cartridges. The indentations on the heads of the exploded shells so fired were put under the miscroscope and compared with the indentations found on the heads of the 33 exploded shells picked up in the streets of Brownsville, which indentations were similarly magnified. The 33 exploded shells were otherwise subjected to the most careful inspection by these experts. The result of this investigation was submitted to the committee in the form of an official report made by these officers to the Secretary of War. It is found at pages 1309–1325 of the record. Without being unduly tedious, the results were:

1. That there was such an exact identity between the indentations found on the heads of the thirty-three exploded shells picked up in the streets of Brownsville and the indentations found upon the exploded shells fired from four certain guns belonging to Company B of the Twenty-fifth Infantry that the officers reported that beyond a reasonable doubt the shells picked up in the streets of Brownsville had been fired out of those four guns.

2. The experts further reported that they found that three of the shells picked up in the streets of Brownsville had a double indentation, as though a first attempt to fire them had failed and they had then been put a second time in the piece and struck a second time with the hammer or firing pin before they were exploded.

3. They further officially reported that certain of the shells picked up in the streets of Brownsville, nine in number, bore marks indicating that they had been twice or oftener inserted in a rifle as though to be fired.

DOUBLE INDENTATIONS.

The officers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry and all the men who were examined on the point testified that when they first received their rifles, about the last of April, 1906, at Fort Niobrara, they were found to be so heavily oiled with cosmoline that the spring which shot the bolt forward with the firing pin to strike the head of the cartridge and explode it was impeded to such an extent that it was a matter of frequent occurrence that cartridges failed to explode at the first stroke, but that after, by the use of coal oil and in other ways, this cosmoline had been entirely removed so that the spring worked freely such a thing as failure to explode practically never happened; and all testified that long before these troops left Fort Niobrara, where they used their rifles in target practice, they ceased to have any such difficulty and that during all the time they were in Brownsville no such difficulty could have been experienced if they had had occasion to use their rifles.

THE DOUBLE INSERTION.

As to the double insertion of cartridges the officers and men all testified that while they were engaged in target practice at Fort Niobrara the call to cease firing very frequently was sounded after a cartridge had been inserted but before it was fired; that this was a matter of practically daily occurrence; that always the soldier was required when the call to cease firing was sounded to at once remove from his gun any cartridge that might have been inserted but not yet fired, and that this cartridge so withdrawn was reinserted and fired when firing was resumed, and that in this way shells would show marks indicating that they had been inserted more than once in the firing piece. The officers and men all testified that except only on the target range at Fort Niobrara there was never in the history of these arms any such double insertion of cartridges or any occasion for such double insertion. It was the opinion of all the officers and men who testified on the subject that these double insertions never could have occurred except only on the target range at Fort Niobrara.

What these officers say shows how improbable it is that such a double insertion could have occurred in connection with the shooting affray at Brownsville, when it is remembered that when an attempt is made to fire a cartridge and the attempt fails the bolt must be drawn backward, with the result that the ejector throws the cartridge out of the chamber and to the distance of anywhere from 3 to 10 feet away from the gun. The idea that a raider would undertake in the darkness of such a night, and under such circumstances, to recover an ejected cartridge that had failed to explode in order that it might be reinserted in the piece, is utterly untenable. The same is equally true as to those cartridges showing double indentations. There could not be any double indentation without pulling back the bolt after the first indentation, with the consequent expulsion of the cartridge from the chamber out into the darkness and to the distance of 3 to 10 feet away from the gun, then recovering and reinserting the cartridge. To suppose that on such an occasion, under such circumstances, any such thing would or could occur is an extreme improbability, if not an actual impossibility.

THE FOUR GUNS.

The four guns out of which the experts found that the shells picked up in Brownsville must have been fired were identified by their numbers. The testimony shows that on the night of the shooting three of these guns were assigned respectively to Thomas Taylor, Joseph L. Wilson, and Ernest English, privates of Company B. These men appeared and testified that they were in their quarters asleep when the firing commenced, that they heard the call to arms, rushed with their comrades to the gun racks, each getting some gun which he carried for that night and which he returned after the company was dismissed for the night to the gun racks, where they were locked up and kept until morning; that the following morning each one found his gun in the rack and that when submitted for inspection it was found to be perfectly clean and bright, showing no evidence whatever of having been fired during the night. All testify that in the excitement and confusion each soldier grabbed the first gun he could get, but that all guns were found in the racks, where they were verified after the firing was over. These witnesses were clear, straightforward, and unqualified in all their statements, and their testimony should be sufficient, in the absence of specific contradiction, to establish the fact that no one of their guns was used in the shooting affray.

They are confirmed by the testimony of their company commander, Lieutenant Lawrason, who testified, at pages 1579 and 1580, as follows:

"Q. Did you learn before your company was dismissed that night that it had been charged by Mayor Combe that the soldiers of the garrison had fired on the town?—A. Yes, sir. I was near the main gate into town when Mayor Combe came up, and I heard part of the conversation with Major Penrose, in which Mayor Combe accused the soldiers of having done the shooting.

"Q. Until that time had you any thought of that kind with respect to the matter?—A. No, sir; I did not; I did not believe for an instant that the men had done it.

"Q. That was the first intimation you had that anybody made any such claim?—A. Yes, sir; it was.

"Q. And then it was after that that Major Penrose dismissed you and told you to make these examinations, was it?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You took your company back, as I understand you, to the barracks and dismissed the company. Then what did you do in execution of the major's orders?—A. I saw the arms locked in the racks and later——

"Q. I will ask you, before you left the racks, whether or not you counted the guns after they were put into the racks?—A. Yes, sir; I counted them.

"Q. How many were there, or were they all there?—A. I don't remember the exact number, but I remember adding to the exact number the number of men on guard and the number of rifles that should be in the storehouse, and the first sergeant's rifle, and adding up seventy.

"Q. That is to say, you accounted for seventy rifles, did you?—A. Yes, sir

"Q. Was that the full number that had been issued to that company?—A. That was all that we had—all the Springfield rifles we had.

"Q. And you remember, do you, positively that at that time you knew that you had in the gun racks the full number of rifles that should be there after deducting the other rifles that you accounted for as being elsewhere?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. If there had been three rifles missing from the racks, would you or not have detected it?—A. If there had been what?

"Q. If there had been three rifles missing, would you have detected it?—A. I believe I would have detected one short.

"Q. You would have detected one short. Now, do you remember Thomas Taylor of your company?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Do you remember seeing him that night?—A. I know that he was present that night, though I don't remember seeing his face in the ranks.

"Q. How do you know that he was present—I mean present with your company, and I suppose you mean that?—A. Yes, sir; because I know that he was carried on the rolls of the company at this time, and I checked up the whereabouts of every man in the company that night.

"Q. And you know that he answered to his name at the roll call, do you?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Or if not that, that you found him elsewhere?—A. Yes, sir; I know he was accounted for at that roll call.

"Q. You have told us of all who were absent from the ranks when the roll was called and he was not one of them; so therefore it follows that he was in ranks, does it not?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, is that true also of Joseph L. Wilson?—A. Yes, sir; that is true of Joseph L. Wilson also.

"Q. Do you remember seeing him in ranks that night?—A. No, sir; I do not. He is on one end of the company, and I believe in the rear rank, or at any rate not directly in front of me in the company. He is smaller than most of the men in the company.

"Q. But if he had been absent when his name was called, you would have detected his absence, you would have observed it?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You were paying particular attention, were you not, to the roll call?—A. Yes, sir; I was, because I believed that the barracks had been fired into, and I wanted to see if any man had possibly been wounded and left upstairs.

"Q. And you also stated that you knew the voice of every man so you could distinguish it and recognize it when he answered to his name?—A. Yes, sir; I believe I am familiar with every voice in the company.

"Q. Now, is what you have stated as to Thomas Taylor and Joseph L. Wilson also true as to Ernest English?—A. Yes, sir; I believe English was also present.

"Q. Do you remember seeing him that night?—A. No, sir; I can not positively state that I saw the face of any man in the ranks that night.

"Q. But you do remember distinctly that every man was in ranks answering to his name, except those whom you have given us the names of, who were away on the several duties you have mentioned?—A. Yes, sir."

THE FOURTH GUN.

But however it may be as to the testimony of these three men being sufficient to show that these three guns were not fired that night, the testimony is absolutely conclusive as to the fourth gun that it was not fired that night. This fourth gun, being 45683, was originally issued at Fort Niobrara to Sergeant Blaney. Shortly before the battalion left Fort Niobrara for Brownsville his term of enlistment expired, and he reenlisted and took the usual furlough of three months, to which he was entitled. Before starting on his furlough he turned in his gun to the quartermaster-sergeant, Walker McCurdy, who placed his name on a piece of paper and put it in the bore of the gun next to the chamber, and then placed it in the arm chest and locked it up. Sergeant Blaney did not return to the company until after it left Fort Brown. On the night of the shooting his gun, with others, was still in this arm chest. They were all placed there when the battalion left Fort Niobrara. On arrival at Fort Brown this arm chest was put in the storeroom, and for want of room other baggage was piled on top of the chest. On the night of the firing, and immediately after the company was dismissed for the night, Lieutenant Lawrason, the company commander, under orders from Major Penrose, proceeded to verify his rifles. He carefully counted the rifles in the gun racks and found there the exact number that belonged in the racks. He then went to the storeroom, taking with him the quartermaster-sergeant, who unlocked the room, that he might enter. After entering the room he told the quartermaster-sergeant that he wanted to verify the guns in his custody—those in the arm chest. The quartermaster-sergeant thereupon removed the baggage that had been piled on top of the arm chests, unscrewed the lids, opened up the guns, and Lieutenant Lawrason counted them, finding that every gun was there—not one missing. In this way he establishes that Blaney's gun was at the time of the firing in the arm chest, with the lid screwed down and baggage on top of the chest, and the door of the storeroom fastened under lock and key. In other words, it is conclusively shown that as to this one gun at least it was utterly impossible for it to have been fired in Brownsville or that it ever had been fired, except only on the target range at Fort Niobrara before the battalion left there.

Lieutenant Lawrason's testimony on this point is as follows:

"Q. That night, when the guns were put back in the racks, did you count them?—A. Yes, sir; I counted them as they were placed in the racks.

"Q. Were the rifles locked up?—A. They were, sir.

"Q. By whom?—A. By the noncommissioned officer in charge of quarters.

"Q. Who was that?—A. Sergt. George W. Jackson.

"Q. Is he a reliable man, or not?—A. I believe him to be a reliable man, sir.

"Q. And a truthful man?—A. I think so, sir.

"Q. He had been a sergeant in that company for a long time, had he not?—A. He had, for several years, I believe, sir. He was in the company when I joined it.

"Q. And a man of good record in every sense?—A. I believe he was, sir.

"Now, you saw the gun racks locked by him; then what did you do next after you had put the rifles away and locked them up in that manner?—A. I then went down and inspected the rifles in the storehouse.

"Q. Who was in charge of the storehouse, or storeroom, whichever you call it?—A. Quartermaster-Sergeant Walker McCurdy.

"Q. Was he, also, an old sergeant?—A. Yes, sir; he was an old sergeant of Company B.

"Q. Was he or not a reliable and truthful man?—A. I always believed him to be such, sir.

"Q. He had been in the service many years, had he not?—A. Yes, sir; he had.

"Q. And had everybody's confidence as a good soldier and a faithful noncommissioned officer?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He was the quartermaster-sergeant. As quartermaster-sergeant, what was his duty with respect to the surplus rifles and surplus ammunition? I mean surplus in the sense that it was not in the hands of the men?—A. He was accountable for it, and it was his business to keep it locked up.

"Q. You went to the storeroom after you locked up the rifles; who went with you to the storeroom?—A. The quartermaster-sergeant.

"Q. Sergeant McCurdy?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did you do and what did you tell him, and in what condition did you find the room; was it locked or unlocked when you went to it?—A. It was locked and he opened it. He took out a bunch of keys, as I recollect it, and fumbled around and got the right key and unlocked the door. The storeroom was very small, and we could not put all of our quartermaster property in there, and there was some confusion in the way in which the stuff was piled. We had to remove a lot of company property.

"Q. I will come to that in a minute. What did you tell Sergeant McCurdy you wanted in the storeroom when you went there: did you tell him or not what you wanted to do until you got into the storeroom?—A. No, sir; when I got into the storeroom I told him that I wanted to see the rifles that he had in the storeroom.

"Q. That is, rifles that he had in his possession?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you know how many rifles he had in his possession at the time?—A. I did, by referring to the company property book which was kept there.

"Q. We will speak about that presently. Now, go on and state what you did and what he did when you told him.—A. He told me that the rifles were locked up in the arm chests. I told him to open them, and he opened one full arm chest that contained ten rifles, and also opened another that, I believe, contained two or three rifles and several old company shotguns.

"Q. Now, before you opened the arm chests, let me ask you whether or not they were easy to get at, or whether there was anything on top of them?—A. No, sir; they were not easy to get at. As I recollect, we removed considerable property before we got the arm chests out and got room to unscrew the lids.

"Q. What kind of property was this?—A. Iron quartermaster bunks and, I believe, some iron uprights to hold mosquito bars—T-shaped things.

"Q. They had been piled on top of these arm chests, had they?—A. Yes, sir; and were standing against the wall, between us and the arm chests.

"Q. When had you last before that seen these arm chests, and where?—A. I had seen them at Fort Niobrara, Nebr., before shipment, and when they were unloaded from the wagons and placed in the storehouse at Fort Brown.

"Q. Where were these extra guns placed in these arm chests, whether at Fort Niobrara or Fort Brown, or where?—A. They were placed in the arm chests at Fort Niobrara.

"Q. Do you remember seeing the guns—rifles—put in the arm chests and the arm chests closed up for shipment at Fort Niobrara?—A. I do not believe I was present when the property was boxed up. It was boxed up some time before our departure, and Captain Shattuck was in command of the company at that time.

"Q. You have told us in what condition you found the chests as to other property being piled on top; this property was removed, was it, from the tops of the chests?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And then were the chests opened, or not?—A. They were opened under my supervision and the arms counted.

"Q. State in what condition you found the inside of those chests, as to the arms.—A. The arms were placed in the proper grooves for them, and they were battened down, or held down by cleats that fit in the boxes, to prevent their rattling around during shipment.

"Q. They had been fixed that way before they had left Niobrara?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And were they in that same condition when you opened them that night?—A. They were in the same condition, sir.

"Q. Did you count the rifles when they were opened up?—A. Yes, sir; I counted them.

"Q. I will ask you another question—whether or not, before these rifles were shipped from Fort Niobrara, they were coated with cosmoline oil or any other kind of oil?—A. I believe they were coated with cosmoline oil at the time I looked at them at Fort Brown.

"Q. When you looked at them was there any indication that they had been disturbed in any way whatever since they had been boxed up at Fort Niobrara?—A. No, sir; there was not; I did not take out all the rifles; I could count them without taking them out of the boxes; I picked up one or two from the top.

"Q. And you did count the rifles in both boxes?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you remember that the requisite number of rifles were there, added to the other rifles that you found in the racks, and that you counted as away from there, to make up the number of 70?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. There was not a rifle missing, was there? —A. No, sir."

On this point Quartermaster-Sergeant Walker McCurdy testified (p. 1658) as follows:

"Q. What book is that in front of you there? See if you recognize it.—A. This is the company's property book, sir.

"Q. The company property book of Company B?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Will you turn to that and see what gun Sergeant Blaney had assigned to him, according to that book, when these new Springfield rifles were issued?—A. (Examining book.) I think it was 45683.

"Q. 45683?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, it has been testified to, I believe, that Sergeant Blaney was absent on furlough. When did he go away on furlough?—A. It was about the same time I was made quartermaster-sergeant—about the 9th or 10th of June.

"Q. That is, you succeeded him when he went away on furlough?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Had he returned while you were yet at Brownsville? When did he return?—A. He returned at El Reno.

"Q. He was not with you at Fort Brown at all?—A. No, sir.

"Q. What was done with his gun when he left to go on furlough the 9th of June, or whatever date it was?—A. He took it up and packed it away.

"Q. He turned it in?—A. No, sir; he turned in his own rifle. He will tell you himself that when he returned there was a slip of paper put in the chamber to show whose rifle it was, to keep me from issuing it to anyone else.

"Q. Who put that in there?—A. I put it in there myself.

"Q. What was on that slip of paper?—A. 'William Blaney.'

"Q. Now, when he returned, were you still with the company?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. At El Reno?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you were still quartermaster-sergeant?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And did you continue as quartermaster-sergeant?—A. Until I was discharged, sir.

"Q. Until you were discharged?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, what was done in the matter of providing Sergeant Blaney with a gun?—A. I gave him his same rifle back.

"Q. You gave him back that same rifle?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What does the company book show there as to what ultimately became of it?—A. The company property book only shows here that it was checked off. At least it is struck out now, because it was checked off.

"Q. Look at the number of the gun and see whether there are same initials placed over the number?—A. No, sir; only 'O. K.' here, when it was turned in.

"Q. What is that written over the number [indicating on book]?—A. That is the captain's check mark.

"Q. That is 'C. C. K.?'—A. It is 'O. K.'

"Q. No; 'C. C. K.'—A. That is the captain's check mark, of Captain Kinney. He could tell you. He did that himself.

"Q. The gun was turned in. You were quartermaster-sergeant when the gun was turned in?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. State whether or not when the guns were turned in Captain Kinney was captain of the company.—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And his name is C. C. Kinney?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. State whether or not he checked up every number.—A. He had that book and he checked it up.

"Q. Can you tell us where that gun, No. 45683—is that the number?—A. 45683, I think it is, sir. [Examining book.] There is a check over it, but I think that is what it is, No. 45683.

"Senator WARNER. That is the number you gave?

"Senator FORAKER. Yes.

"By Senator FORAKER:

"Q. Well, it is the number that is there. State where that gun was on the night of the 13th of August, 1906.—A. It was in the arm chest, sir, in the company.

"Q. In the arm chest?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was the arm chest open or closed?—A. It was closed, sir.

"Q. Where was the arm chest?—A. It was in the storeroom.

"Q. How long had it been in that arm chest, and who had placed it there?—A. I placed it there at Fort Niobrara.

"Q. At Niobrara?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. It was one of the guns that were in your charge? It was one of a number in your charge at that time, was it?—A. Yes sir.

"Q. You have already testified that you packed up in arm chests all the guns you had charged to you?—A. All the surplus guns that were not in the hands of the men, sir.

"Q. You have a clear, positive, distinct recollection of that fact, have you?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You can not be mistaken about it?—A. No, sir.

"Q. It was No. 45683? That was the number?—A. Yes, sir."

If this gun was not fired that night in Brownsville, as the testimony conclusively shows it was not, then it follows that if the shells picked up in the streets of Brownsville were fired out of this gun they must have been fired at Fort Niobrara. The testimony shows this was both possible and probable.

Before this microscopic inspection was made or any such question was foreseen it was established by uncontradicted testimony that Company B took with it to Brownsville as a part of its baggage a box containing from 1,600 to 2,000 exploded shells with a proportionate number of clips, and that after arrival at Brownsville this box, opened, stood on the back porch of B barracks, where anyone passing might have access to it and remove shells and clips from it. The microscopic report says that the shells picked in the streets of Brownsville and put in evidence were, beyond a reasonable doubt, fired out of these four guns belonging to B Company. If so, then it also follows that they were fired, not in Brownsville, but at Fort Niobrara, and that they were found in the streets, not because they fell there when fired, but because they had been placed there by persons unknown, who had secured them from this box of shells standing on the back porch and easily accessible to anyone disposed to remove them therefrom. In other words, the microscopic inspection shows conclusively, not that the soldiers were guilty of the firing, but that the soldiers were free from such guilt.

That this microscopic inspection did not establish anything more than that the shells found were fired from the four guns mentioned and did not show the time or place when they were fired or the parties by whom fired was evidently the conclusion reached by General Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, who concludes his review of this testimony, made in his last annual report (p. 36), as follows:

"The bearing of these facts upon the identity of the persons doing the firing and upon the time when the cases and bullets were fired in the guns is not a concern of this Department."

THE BANDOLEER.

A bandoleer, such as the soldiers use, was picked up in the Cowen alley the next morning after the firing, and that has been put in evidence against the soldiers. Each of the quartermaster-sergeants of the three companies has testified that before they left Fort Niobrara every bandoleer was taken up and returned to the arsenal, and that no bandoleer was issued from the time of their arrival at Brownsville until the companies were formed after the shooting commenced, and that consequently the bandoleer that was found could not have belonged to any of the soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry. The testimony further shows that when the Twenty-sixth Infantry left Fort Brown, a few days before the arrival of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, they left some bandoleers in the barracks, and that they were gathered up and carried away by scavengers and citizens of Brownsville, along with articles of discarded clothing and other articles left behind. In addition, there would be no reason why the soldiers, if they planned the raid, as is claimed, should carry a bandoleer and throw it away in the streets when they could carry many times more cartridges than they had any need for in their regular belts.

THE BULLETS.

Seven bullets and parts of the steel jackets of two other bullets which were cut from houses into which it is claimed they were fired that night have been put in evidence. These bullets bear the marks of four lands, such as would be made by a Springfield rifle, such as the soldiers had, or a Krag rifle, or a Krag carbine, or a Mauser rifle. It is insisted that they must have been fired from the Springfield rifle, because the exploded shells that were picked up at the points where the firing occurred were Springfield rifle shells, indicating that the bullets belonged to Springfield rifle cartridges; and it is claimed that these cartridges are too long to be fired out of the Krag rifle or carbine. To this claim it may be answered that disconnecting the bullets that were cut out of the houses and put in evidence from the exploded shells that were picked up at the points where the firing occurred, it is impossible to tell whether the bullets were fired out of a Springfield rifle or from a Krag rifle or Krag carbine. The Springfield and Krag bullets are of the same weight and of the same general appearance. The witnesses all testified that it was impossible, looking at the bullets alone as they were put in evidence, to tell whether they had been fired from the one kind of rifle or the other.

Neither does it follow that if the bullets were fired out of the shells that were picked up at the points where the firing was done that they were fired from Springfield rifles, for the testimony shows that by slightly reaming out the bore of the Krag rifle the Springfield cartridge could be inserted in it and fired from it.

See General Crozier (page 2862):

"Q. Now, let me ask you if there is any difficulty about boring that barrel so as to accommodate this cartridge?—A. I take it to be easily done." * * *

* * * * * * *

"By Senator OVERMAN:

"Q. Do I understand you to say that if the bore was enlarged that the cartridge could be fired from that gun?—A. I do not see any reason why it should not be fired from the gun, sir; but I should suspect that the extractor would not work very well with it, and that it would not be a very workmanlike piece of mechanism when you get through."

The testimony shows that at least four Krag rifles were disposed of to citizens of Brownsville by the quartermaster-sergeant of Company K of the Twenty-sixth Infantry shortly before the arrival at Brownsville of the battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry.

There is evidence to the effect that there were other Krag rifles in the possession of the citizens of Brownsville. Mayor Combe testified that the Texas Rangers were formerly armed with the Krag carbine, out of which Springfield cartridges could have been fired if the bores were reamed, as they might have been.

ANALYSIS OF BULLETS.

A number of the bullets taken from the houses of Brownsville, into which they had been fired the night of August 13, 1906, were found by chemical analysis to correspond in composition to a special lot of bullets manufactured and supplied to the Government by the Union Metallic Cartridge Company under a contract dated June 29, 1905.

It is further shown that this composition does not correspond to the composition of any other Army bullet of which we have been given any account.

The testimony shows that the negro troops were supplied in part with cartridges from this lot, but the testimony does not show that the cartridges with which the negro troops were supplied out of this special lot were manufactured in December, 1905, the date stamped on the Union Metallic shells picked up in the streets of Brownsville the morning after the affray.

The testimony further shows that the companies of the Twenty-sixth Infantry stationed at Fort Brown, which were relieved by the Twenty-fifth Infantry, were supplied with precisely the same kind of ammunition and that when they left Fort Brown a few days before the arrival of the negro troops, they left many of these cartridges carelessly scattered about the barracks, and that citizens and children were allowed to and did visit the barracks and carry them away at pleasure. (See testimony of Quartermaster Sergt. Rowland Osborn and others.)

Conceding, therefore, that the bullets cut out of the houses of Brownsville were the same in composition as those with which the negro troops were supplied, it must also be conceded that they were the same as those with which the companies of the Twenty-sixth were supplied.

The testimony also shows conclusively that it was possible for the citizens to have acquired these cartridges from those left behind by the Twenty-sixth, while there is no testimony to show that any of them came from those issued to the Twenty-fifth. On the contrary, the testimony shows, as has been pointed out, that the different companies of the Twenty-fifth accounted for all their ammunition practically to a cartridge.

RECAPITULATION.

To recapitulate, the testimony of the eyewitnesses against the soldiers is not reliable, because of the darkness of the night, which made it impossible to see with any distinctness, and because of the many contradictions of the testimony of the various witnesses, especially that of Preciado, Littlefield, and Dominguez.

2. In the second place, the confirmatory or circumstantial evidence of the exploded shells that were picked up in the streets of Brownsville and put in evidence is shown by the microscopic inspection to be conclusive testimony in favor of the innocence of the soldiers.

3. The clips, the bandoleer, and the bullets are not of themselves evidence of the guilt of the men, because in view of the testimony not inconsistent with their innocence.

The testimony in favor of the soldiers is—

1. Their good record as both men and soldiers, both before August 13, 1906, and since.

3. The soldiers are confirmed in the claim that they are innocent by the fact that immediately after the firing their ammunition was verified and not a cartridge was missing, and the next morning as soon as it was light enough their guns were rigidly inspected and not one was found to show any evidence whatever of having been fired the night before. There is much testimony in the record in regard to the length of time required to properly clean a gun after it has been fired so that it would pass such an inspection as these guns were subjected to the following morning. The overwhelming weight of this testimony is that it would require from fifteen to thirty minutes to clean these guns so that they would pass such an inspection as that to which they were subjected, and that it would be impossible to so clean them in the dark or by artificial light, and that the men had no opportunity to clean them that night.

This testimony was given not alone by the colored soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, but also by a large number of white soldiers from the Twenty-sixth Infantry.

4. So far as Company C is concerned, the testimony shows they had only guard ammunition, lead bullets without steel jackets, and only 650 rounds of that, and that after the firing they were found to have every cartridge. No one pretends that any bullets of this character were found, or that there is a particle of evidence to show that any such ammunition was used. And yet this is the company against which, until it was shown that they had only guard cartridges, all suspicion was directed, due to the fact that all the men who had any trouble at Brownsville—Newton, Reed, and Adair—belonged to this company; and because on account of delay in opening the gun racks the men broke them open to get their guns and respond to the call to arms, a circumstance that was urged as an evidence of guilt until it was shown it was done by the orders of Major Penrose.

5. As to the other two companies, the calling of the roll in Company B while the firing was yet in progress, and the personal inspection and verification of Company D by Captain Lyon also while the firing was still in progress, coupled with the fact that every man of the company was present or accounted for, with not a missing cartridge or a dirty gun, would seem in any ordinary case to be enough to exonerate them, to say nothing of the unqualified, straightforward testimony that clears all of them. To find these men guilty upon such a state of evidence is to disregard, violate, and reverse every recognized rule for the weighing of testimony, and can be explained only upon the theory that no matter what may be shown in behalf of the soldiers it is to be ignored or held to be unworthy of credence, notwithstanding their good character and reputation for truth and veracity and general reliability and trustworthiness, as testified to by their officers, who knew them better in these respects than it was possible for anybody else to know them. So to ignore and disregard their testimony is to hold that not only are all the men who have testified conspirators, murderers, and perjurers, but also that Major Penrose and all his officers, than whom no officers in all the Army are more honorable and upright and reliable men, together with General Burt, were not entitled to credence when they testified that they believe their men have told the truth and that they are entirely innocent. There is no ground whatever on which to justify such monstrous conclusions.

6. The testimony further shows that the first five or six shots fired were pistol or revolver shots. Major Penrose and his officers and also Mayor Combe, all experts, testified positively that the first shots were pistol shots. They are confirmed in this by a number of other witnesses. The testimony is conclusive that the men of the battalion had no pistols or revolvers in their possession. The only revolvers that had been issued to these companies were still in the boxes in which they had come from the arsenal. If, therefore, the first shots were pistol shots, they could not have been fired by the soldiers. Immediately after these first five or six pistol shots all testify that there was firing from high-power guns, but whether they were Springfield rifles or Krag rifles or Krag carbines or Winchester rifles or Mauser rifles no one could tell from the sound. So far, therefore, as the reports or sounds of the firing were concerned, they might have been made by the firing of Krag guns or Winchester guns or Mauser guns.

7. But assuming that because of the marks of the four lands on the bullets they were fired from either a Springfield or a Krag rifle or a Krag carbine, the testimony shows that a number of Krag rifles—four at least—with the numbers effaced had been sold to citizens of Brownsville by the quartermaster-sergeant of one of the companies of the Twenty-sixth Infantry only a short time before the negro soldiers arrived there. In addition, Mayor Combe testified that the Texas Rangers were, until recently, armed with Krag carbines.

8. The bullets taken from houses and put in evidence, as already pointed out, may have been fired either from Krag carbines or Krag rifles, or they might have been fired from Mauser rifles.

9. The location of the six shells and five clips founds by Captain Macklin on a circular area not more than 10 inches in diameter indicates that they must have been placed where he found them, and no one has suggested any purpose the soldiers could have had in placing them there.

10. The bullet cut from the post in front of Crixell's was not a soldier's bullet and could not have been fired from any gun the soldiers had.

11. The microscopic inspection and report. All these several points are absolutely inconsistent with the theory that the soldiers did the shooting; but in addition to what such evidence proves, there is the improbability of soldiers with such a record as these soldiers had forming and executing any such conspiracy, and especially in the way claimed.

In the first place, the formation and execution of such a conspiracy would require a higher order of ability than any of the men of the battalion possessed; but it is not possible that men capable of planning such a raid and so managing its execution as to defy detection would be absurdly stupid as to commence their operations by firing from their own quarters and grounds, and then, after they had thus aroused the town and fixed their identity as soldiers, and not until then, jump over the wall and start on their errand of outrage and murder.

NO MOTIVE.

In the second place, there was no sufficient motive. To begin with, the only motive suggested is one of revenge—revenge by indiscriminate murder of men, women, and children—because some of the saloons would not sell to the soldiers except at separate bars, and because one of the soldiers, Private Newton, was hit over the head with a revolver by Customs Officer Tate and knocked down and badly injured without any adequate excuse therefor, and because one or two others of the soldiers had been unfortunate enough to have some petty difficulty. As to this provocation, the testimony is conclusive that the soldiers made no complaint because they were denied the equal privileges of the saloons, and it is further shown that Newton showed no special resentment and took no steps beyond reporting his trouble to his commanding officer, who promised to have it investigated, with which Newton expressed himself as entirely satisfied. The testimony shows, moreover, that Newton is a quiet, inoffensive, peaceable-minded man, who was on guard duty that night, but off post and asleep in the guardhouse when the firing commenced. His character was such that he would be most unlikely to conceive the idea of organizing a conspiracy, or induce men to join one, to shoot up the town in the way alleged, especially one to avenge his wrongs, but of which he was not an active participator.

STARCK'S HOUSE NOT MISTAKEN FOR TATE'S HOUSE.

It has been said, as evidence that the motive of the soldiers was to revenge Newton's wrongs, that the raiders fired into Starck's house, adjoining the house in which Customs Officer Tate lived, evidently mistaking it for Tate's house. This is thought to be a strong point to indicate that it was the soldiers who did the shooting and that they were seeking to revenge Newton's wrongs by shooting up the house of the man who had wronged him. The testimony shows that some months prior to the shooting Starck, whose house was shot into, and who was also a customs officer, had undertaken to arrest a smuggler by the name of Avillo, who lived in Brownsville and who had worked for Starck and was perfectly familiar with Starck's house and its location, and that Avillo resisted arrest and Starck felled him to the ground with his revolver almost in the identical way that Tate had felled the soldier Newton. The testimony further shows that this smuggler, who was thus knocked down by Starck, was put under bond to appear at court, and that he had forfeited his bond and was at the time of this shooting affair an outlaw and fugitive from justice. It would seem far more likely that Avillo, the outlaw and fugitive from justice, remembering his injuries, had something to do with the shooting up of Starck's house than that Newton, who appeared as a witness, and who showed that he was on guard duty that night, was out with a lot of raiders, or that a lot of raiders were out, on his account, without him accompanying them, trying to shoot up Tate's house, of the location of which there was no evidence to show they had any knowledge whatever, and that they fired into Starck's house by mistake. The probabilities are that the men who shot into Mr. Starck's house knew whose house they were shooting into and knew why they were shooting into it. Mr. Starck's testimony was to the effect that he had arrested during the term of his service as a customs officer more than 600 smugglers at Brownsville.

And if a motive be demanded for the shooting of Dominguez it would seem more likely that he received his injuries at the hands of some of the numerous criminals he had arrested and enforced the law against during his long term of service as a municipal officer than that he was singled out by the soldiers to be shot by them, with whom he had had no trouble whatever of any kind. But however all this may be, we are of the opinion that—

1. The testimony wholly fails to identify the particular individuals, or any of them, who participated in the shooting affray that occurred at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906.

2. The testimony wholly fails to show that the discharged soldiers of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, or any of them, entered into any agreement or so-called "conspiracy of silence," or that they had among themselves any understanding of any nature to withhold any information of which they, or any of them, might be possessed concerning the shooting affray that occurred at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906.

3. The testimony is so contradictory, and much of it so unreliable, that it is not sufficient to sustain the charge that soldiers of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, or any of them, participated in the shooting affray that occurred at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906.

4. The weight of the testimony shows that none of the soldiers of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry participated in the shooting affray that occurred at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906.

5. Whereas the testimony shows that the discharged men had a good record as soldiers, and that many of them had by their long and faithful service acquired valuable rights of which they are deprived by a discharge without honor; and

Whereas the testimony shows beyond a reasonable doubt that whatever may be the fact as to who did the shooting, many of the men so discharged were innocent of any offense in connection therewith: Therefore it is, in our opinion, the duty of Congress to provide by appropriate legislation for the correction of their record and for their reenlistment and reinstatement in the Army, and for the restoration to them of all the rights of which they have been deprived, and we so recommend.

J. B. FORAKER.
M. G. BULKELEY.

As indicating the character of legislation that should be enacted, as above recommended, we attach hereto Senate bill 5729, of which the following is a copy, and recommend its passage:

"A bill to correct the records and authorize the reenlistment of certain noncommissioned officers and enlisted men belonging to Companies B, C, and D, of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, who were discharged without honor under Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, November 9, 1906, and the restoration to them of all rights of which they have been deprived on account thereof.

"Be it enacted, etc., That any noncommissioned officer or enlisted man belonging to Company B, C, or D, of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, discharged without honor under Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, dated November 9, 1906, on account of the shooting affray that occurred at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906, who shall make oath before any duly authorized enlisting officer of the United States Army or Navy that he did not participate in said affray, and that he does not know of any soldier belonging to any of said companies who did participate in the same, and that he has not at any time heretofore and does not now withhold any knowledge with respect to that occurrence which, if made public, would or might lead to the identification of any participator in said shooting affray or any accessory thereto, either before or after the fact, and that he has answered fully to the best of his knowledge and ability all questions that have been lawfully put to him by his officers or others in connection therewith, shall be, and hereby is, made eligible to reenlist in the military or naval forces of the United States on his application therefor at any time within three months from and after the passage of this act, any statute or provision of law or order or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding; and that upon such reenlistment he shall be allowed full pay, according to the rank he held and the pay he was receiving at the date of discharge until his reenlistment: Provided, That all the rights and privileges to which the soldiers reenlisting under the provisions of this act were entitled, respectively, at the time of their discharge shall be, and hereby are, fully restored to them, and the record showing their discharge without honor shall be, and hereby is, annulled, set aside, and held for naught, and the time elapsing since their discharge without honor until the date of such reenlistment shall be computed in determining all rights to which they may be respectively entitled on account of continuous service as though they had been in the service without interruption, and they shall not suffer any forfeiture of any right or privilege by reason of such discharge: Provided further, That in any case where the regular term of enlistment which the soldier was serving at the time when discharged without honor has in the meanwhile expired, his record shall be, and hereby is, corrected so as to show an honorable discharge at the time of the expiration of such enlistment, and he shall be allowed full pay and all rights and privileges until that time; and in the event of the reenlistment of such soldier under the provisions of this act his term of reenlistment shall be deemed to have commenced as of the time when his previous enlistment expired, and his service under such reenlistment shall be without prejudice of any kind by reason of his former discharge without honor: And provided further, That in case any of the noncommissioned officers or enlisted men belonging to said companies and discharged without honor shall have died since they were so discharged and before the passage of this act, but who shall have testified under oath or made affidavit before their death that they did not participate in said shooting affray or have any knowledge with reference thereto, their respective records shall be, and hereby are, corrected in accordance with the provisions of this act and their legal representatives shall be entitled to all pay that would have become due to them from the time of their discharge until the time of their decease.

"SEC. 2. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit the prosecution and punishment of any soldier reenlisting under the provisions hereof as to whom it may at any time hereafter appear that he did participate in said shooting affray or have knowledge thereof which he has withheld.

"SEC. 3. That all reenlistments under the provisions hereof of soldiers who at the time of their discharge without honor were serving terms of enlistment which have not yet expired shall be held to be for only the remaining portion of said unexpired terms, respectively."

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the committee, who makes the majority report, whether we are to understand that the bill which accompanies that report has now been introduced?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the bill has not been introduced. The report contains the form of a bill, but there has been no bill introduced and none yet reported from the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, might I ask——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Might I ask the chairman of the committee if the committee have under consideration a bill such as the President has recommended?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Texas that I have not yet read the message of the President, as it has been read at the desk; but, as I heard it read, his ideas and those expressed by the four members of the committee would seem to be near enough together so that there may be a bill prepared and introduced in the Senate in the usual way. There is at present no bill before the committee, prepared either according to the President's message or according to the report made by four members of the majority of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure, Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming has not read the President's message. I am equally sure that the President has not read the committee's report; but all of this seems like a race of diligence as to who can do the most to placate the dissatisfied negroes before the Republican convention and then before the general election.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Texas, of course, is giving his views of the Republican party from a Democratic standpoint; and we accept them as such.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the only standpoint from which a man can see the whole of it. Nobody ever sees himself. It is only others who see him. The Senator from Wyoming, of course, is doing his duty as a Senator in this matter, and I am quite content to sit here and see the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Ohio fight this out between themselves. The truth of it is, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio needs none of my assistance and needs none of my sympathy, but as between a multitude and one man, I must sympathize with the one man, even if he is wrong. [Laughter].

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, referring to my colloquy with the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, he will recall that I have good reason to make the inquiry as to whether or not we are to consider the making of this bill a part of the report as an introduction of the bill. It was my understanding that the bill would be introduced this morning. No one having formally introduced it, I make the inquiry in order that I may know what the status of that suggested legislation may be.

I want to say, in answer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that there has been no race of diligence on my part that I am aware of. A week or more ago I introduced a bill, and had it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, where it will shortly be considered and reported on, I hope, which will give authority for the reinstatement of the men who are innocent.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not want the Senator from Ohio to rest under the impression that I meant to impute that to him. I want to say that the Senator from Ohio has been entirely and steadfastly consistent. He may be right or he may be wrong. The other side is certain to have been wrong at one time or another, because they have been on both sides of this question.

Mr. FORAKER. I recognize, Mr. President, that we are making progress; for it is now admitted that some of these men are innocent, and it is further admitted that, as to at least one matter, the President does not have any power, and that he will have to wait on Congress to confer it upon him, in order that right and truth and justice may prevail with respect to the men who are innocent.

But what I want to inquire about is simply whether or not this bill is introduced or is to be introduced, if I may ask the question—and I would not venture to ask it if it were not that I thought it was to be introduced this morning?

Mr. WARREN. There are thirteen men upon the Committee on Military Affairs. Four of those have signed a portion of this report recommending a form of bill. Such a bill, in my opinion, will be introduced, probably, by some one of those four. I submit, however, that the time for the introduction of that bill would naturally fall to those who have favored it, rather than to those who refrained from joining in that recommendation. It is my intention that there shall be a bill introduced very soon, but it is necessary to make a little further investigation as to the part of that proposed bill which refers to the restoration of the rights of the discharged soldiers, and to the pay, whether it includes pay from the time of the reenlistment, if the men may be reenlisted, or whether from some other date. But there will be no unnecessary delay, in my opinion, in the introduction of that bill; and when it is before the committee the Senator from Ohio, myself, and others, of course, will enter into its consideration and report to the Senate whatever may be the conclusion of the committee.

Mr. FORAKER. May I ask the Senator one other question; and that is whether or not he construes the bill, which he has made a part of his report, as a bill restoring to the men who may be found to be innocent full pay and all their rights?

Mr. WARREN. I do not think so. As it reads I think it restores all of their rights; but as to their pay it simply provides that pay shall commence at the time of their reenlistment. That is my opinion of the suggested bill in its present form.

Mr. FORAKER. I agree with the Senator as to that, and I am glad to have his interpretation and construction of his own bill. I am not finding any fault with the Senator for not introducing it this morning. I was only exercising the right, which I suppose I have, of making an inquiry in order that I might know whether we are to expect it to be introduced, and, if so, when.

Mr. WARREN. Assuredly there is no blame. This Brownsville affray investigation has now been conducted in the Military Committee for more than a year, and I will say to the Senate that there has been no misunderstanding between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] and me, or between the Senator and other members of the committee, and there can be none now over this matter of when a bill shall be introduced or what may be its fate.

Mr. FORAKER. I will ask the Senator one further question now, in view of the disposition he manifests, and that is, May we expect it to be introduced at an early day? I will say to the Senator that I am not asking this in any frivolous way, but only because I have some notions of my own as to what I want to do.

Mr. WARREN. I think that it will be introduced at an early day.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, before we pass from this matter, I should like to suggest, with the permission of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that the document which we have just ordered to be printed have upon its title-page, as the text for what shall follow, the President's order dismissing these men. The Senator from Ohio tells us that he has incorporated it in his report, but I would not like to have to look about in the middle of the book for the reason for the book having to be printed. I should like to get it as a preface or on the title-page, right at the start. There never would have been any of this disturbance but for the President's arbitrary action. I should like for this document which relates to it, with this seemingly happy adjustment which is in sight, to give us the cause for this transaction by having the President's order put at the beginning. I hope the Senator will agree to that.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I will explain to the Senator from South Carolina a difficulty about printing the order as a separate document. I have before me my report, and I read from page 33 of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know it is there; the Senator told us he had incorporated it; but I want it to be put at the beginning.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand, and I want to show to the Senator what he will have to include in his request in addition to what he has mentioned.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right. If the Senator has something additional which will throw light on this matter, let it come.

Mr. FORAKER. I will read the order made by the President. It is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 5, 1906.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR:

I have read through General Garlington's report, dated October 22, submitted to me by you. I direct that the recommendations of General Garlington be complied with, and that at the same time the concluding portion of his report be published with our sanction as giving the reasons for the action.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

It is by reference to General Garlington's report, therefore, that we get what the President's order was; that is to say, General Garlington had made a report in which he recommended that the President discharge without honor, as the President did. So I think we ought to have printed the order of the President and this report of General Garlington.

Mr. TILLMAN. As the preface or opening pages of this proposed document.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; at least so much of the report as may be necessary to show the terms of the order.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is what I wish to get, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from South Carolina refers to the title page. I suppose he wishes to show by the title page what the volume contains. If it is the desire of the Senate, the committee will prepare this matter by assembling it and arranging an index, and will of course incorporate the original order of the President and the qualifying order in the message which followed it. As to the Garlington report, which is contained in one of the other of the volumes, I will ask the Senator from Ohio if he has it there before him, in order to know what the length of the report is.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I can not tell.

Mr. TILLMAN. The committee could incorporate General Garlington's recommendations——

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. As part of the President's order.

Mr. FORAKER. That is what I did in my report, thinking that was all that was necessary.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senate desires it, the committee will incorporate at least as much of it as the Senator has quoted, but in this connection it must be remembered that the entire report of the committee, the testimony and all, will be printed.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. And of course will be accessible.

Mr. TILLMAN. But not in connection with this matter that was brought up this morning. Let that be volume 2, 3, 4, 5, or 40, but let us have this little volume with the essentials in a handy shape.

Mr. WARREN. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, as I understand the order for printing, it is, first, that there shall be printed the reports of the committee, the majority and minority reports, which will include all the evidence, and all that material contained in the Garlington report, and in fact everything pertaining to it, except the President's message—this in one order. Now, there will also be printed as a public document the President's message, some portion of the Garlington report, and all three of the papers read this morning.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator takes his seat I will state that it will be remembered that the President on a former occasion revoked part of his original order. I think that order of revocation should also be printed.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; that is a part of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. That marks his progress toward giving these negroes justice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Wyoming please state his request?

Mr. WARREN. The request is, first, that the report of the committee and the views of the minority be printed in the usual way, with all of the papers that accompany the reports.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the report of the committee, with the accompanying testimony and the minority report, be printed in the usual manner, together with the other documents accompanying the report. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WARREN. I now ask that there may be printed also the President's message read at the desk this morning, the President's original order, with the additions presented thereafter, with so much of the Garlington report as the committee may believe to be pertinent to the subject, and all three of the reports read at the desk, but excluding the several volumes of testimony.

Mr. TILLMAN. Including the President's supplemental order, will you not?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RAILWAY MAIL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported the following order, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Ordered, That 2,000 additional copies each of the amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. PENROSE to the bill (H. R. 18347) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, as follows:

1. "For actual and necessary expenses, division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post-Office Department and away from their several designated headquarters, $2,000,000;" and,

2. "That railway mail clerks be allowed thirty days' leave with pay each year, without additional expense to the Department, and that in case of sickness such leave may be extended to sixty days," be printed for the use of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE TO CERTAIN POSTAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported the following order, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Ordered, That 5,000 additional copies of the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. PENROSE to the bill (H. R. 18347) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, as follows: "That after June 30, 1908, employees in first and second class post-offices and in other post-offices having city delivery service may be granted leave of absence with full pay for not exceeding thirty days in a fiscal year," be printed for the use of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

INFLUENCE OF AMERICAN BATTLE-SHIP FLEET ON PACIFIC COMMERCE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have a brief paper from the Sunset Magazine of the present month, by Naval Constructor Evans, the title of which is "The important influence of the American battle-ship fleet on the commerce of the Pacific." It is a valuable paper in view of certain discussions that are going on in the Senate. I ask that it be printed as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. BORAH. By request, I desire to give notice that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is absent from the Chamber on account of illness, will next Monday, the 16th, after the morning business, address the Senate on the unfinished business.

GRANT OF LAND TO VALENTINE, NEBR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1931) to grant certain land, part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Valentine for a site for a reservoir or tank to hold water to supply the public of said village, which were, on page 1, line 5, after "Nebraska," to insert "an easement in, on, and over;" on page 1, line 10, after "United States," to insert: "for the purpose of supplying to said village and its inhabitants water from a stream thereon, with the privilege to erect, construct, and maintain a dam, reservoir, and other facilities proper and convenient to the enjoyment of such easement," and on page 2, line 3, to strike out all after "That" down to and including "United States," line 6, and insert "this privilege shall not interfere with any existing vested right."

Mr. BURKETT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

DAM ACROSS MULBERRY FORK, BLACK WARRIOR RIVER.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16746) to authorize T. H. Friel or assigns to construct a dam across Mulberry Fork of the Black Warrior River.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated by the Senator from Arkansas.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I gave notice a few days since that I would to-day address the Senate on the so-called "Aldrich bill," and incidentally the substitute reported by the minority of the Committee on Finance. I am quite indisposed this morning, and I shall content myself to-day by occupying, I trust, not to exceed ten minutes in stating the reasons why I think no legislation of this kind should now be enacted.

Mr. President, I believe that when we consider the magnitude and the consequences of the recent panic and the remedy now proposed, so revolutionary as that which the pending bill or the substitute seek to introduce into our financial system, there should be the most perfect knowledge of the entire situation that diligence and authority can obtain. I do not believe we are in possession of such information as will enable us at this time to proceed intelligently. I believe that the proposed legislation is premature. I do not believe it necessary, and think it may become dangerous. Because I find my mind in that condition I am not disposed to tolerate the idea of supporting the committee bill nor the substitute proposed by the minority of the committee. I understand by "minority" the Democratic members of the committee, and my respect for the eminent Senators who constitute that minority requires me to state in a few words why I shall not be able to vote for the substitute.

In the first place, I believe that the character, extent, and cause of the panic are perfectly well known to those who have exercised the diligence and who have devoted the time to ascertaining these things. There was nothing the matter with the general prosperity, industry, or temper of the people at the time the panic occurred. It came as a great surprise. It found the people busy. It found the transportation companies with an excess of business upon their hands. It found a hopeful, prosperous people. With the suddenness of the onslaught of a robber band news came out from the stock exchange in New York that business had to be suspended until the victories of one faction of predatory manipulators over another could be adjusted and the loot divided among those entitled under the rough code of the conflict to receive it. I say I think that can be established with that degree of certainty which legislators ordinarily require as the foundation of their official action. I believe it can be demonstrated beyond ground for rational controversy that the panic had its origin within the confines and zone of influence of the New York Stock Exchange, and that whatever remedy is found necessary should not precede the definite ascertainment of its true cause.

I repeat that this legislation is premature, if not dangerous. It is plain that the predatory element of the national banking organizations will take advantage of the distress and demoralization in the commercial affairs of the country that has followed in the wake of that panic to demand further concessions to them, to be ultimately again directed against the commercial peace of this country.

I believe there is now in use in this country a sufficient volume of money to conduct its legitimate business. Every test by which such a state of facts can be demonstrated points to that conclusion. But I shall not undertake to deal with that phase of it to-day, as I have promised to occupy only a few minutes to indicate why I think I ought not to support the substitute of the Democratic minority of the Finance Committee. There are many features of that substitute that constitute improvements over the bill of the majority of the committee. There are many features of the bill which, compared with provisions in the other bill intended to subserve similar purposes, are far inferior.

In the first place, the committee bill proposes to disburse this money—to filter it out to the people—to allow them to enjoy such incidental benefits as may come to them through such national banks as have circulation outstanding in an amount equal to 50 per cent of their capital stock under existing law, and, in addition, having a surplus of 20 per cent. That permits every national bank to qualify itself to participate in the benefits of the act by voluntary action without the exercise of any discretion in its behalf by any public officer.

The minority bill limits the right to enjoy the benefits of this extra use of currency to such national banks as have been or may be designated for that purpose as depositaries of public money. If the Secretary of the Treasury shall not be more liberal in designating depositaries hereafter than in the past, the enjoyment of the privileges or benefits of the substitute will be limited to fourteen hundred only of the seven thousand national banks.

I see no reason why that restriction should exist. If it is to be an emergency currency, the benefit of the supply should be extended to all who stand in need—whose legitimate business demands require that they shall be relieved by this unusual interposition of the bounty of the Government, and who are able and willing to furnish the required security. I do not believe it should be limited to banks which have been previously designated or which might thereafter be designated for the purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury as depositaries of public money.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit me?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator does not quote the substitute exactly. It says "which may be for that purpose," and it was not intended that they be necessarily depositaries generally, either active or inactive, but the Secretary of the Treasury, if he wanted to deposit the money anywhere, could designate national banks, or I do not limit it to national banks, so far as that is concerned. For that particular purpose, and that purpose being served, as a matter of course that would end it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I agree with the Senator about that. He has exercised the privilege authorizing the naming of banks for the exclusive purpose of receiving deposits authorized by the substitute. The great majority of the designated depositaries are of that character now. They are not depositaries of public money generally; only the surplus revenues. I did not then misunderstand the purpose of the Senator, but I did not quite understand then, nor do I now, that it was his intention, in the language he used, to permit the designation of State banks as depositaries of public money. I do not intend to differ with the Senator about what he personally intended to provide, but I make no doubt in my own mind that the language employed, read in connection with the power now existing to authorize any officer to designate banks as depositaries of public money, will confine the Secretary of the Treasury to the designation of national banks only.

Mr. President, I have had a little experience during the present panic in attempting to have three well-known, reputable, solvent, and well-managed national banks in the State of Arkansas, in neighborhoods remote from one another, in communities whose business required the temporary use of capital, designated as depositaries of public money. They were turned down without the slightest hesitation, on the ground that there was no money available; at least that was the reason assigned by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. If I were in favor of an emergency-currency bill at all, I would be in favor of extending its benefits to everybody who can deposit the necessary security. The very nature of the relief itself indicates that that is the proper basis of distribution. It is because people can not get money out of the banks that they need it. The Government provides the bounty for them in order to promote business, thus overcoming the congestion that results by reason of the fact that there is no medium through which current and necessary exchanges can be promptly effected, the crops moved, and the various forms of business that go to make up the volume of the commerce of the country properly conducted.

I would extend it and make it a matter of right to all, the only restraint being a matter of security. Of course I would not expect that it would be dealt with upon such a small scale that a man could go to the Treasury, or some one of the subtreasuries, and borrow $5, but in amounts that would adjust themselves to business of that magnitude that usually finds its way into the transactions of the banking institutions of the country.

I believe the provision that deposits shall be made upon the basis of the population of the several States is a very excellent one, but I think it ought to be made a little more elastic than in this substitute. I think if a State does not desire its quota, or if for any reason its banks are not willing or able to avail themselves of it, there ought to be a provision that, after reasonable time allowed in which to exercise the option, the amount allotted should be transferred to some other State where the necessity demanded relief and where the ability to avail themselves of it existed in adequate degree.

The effect of this substitute, especially in the cotton-growing States of the South, with the exception of the magnificent State of Texas and the State of Virginia, is that they can not avail themselves of it to the extent nominally permitted to them. Texas never showed up better in her history than she does in connection with her national banking facilities. To my amazement I find that that State has about the same national-bank capital and surplus as Indiana and Iowa put together; about as much as Missouri and Nebraska put together. Texas and the State of Virginia are the only two States in the cotton-growing region of the South that could, by reason of the limited national banking facilities, avail themselves of the full allotment assigned to them on population basis under the substitute.

I think, therefore, that both bills, as emergency measures, are too narrow to meet the exigencies of the situation that their passage, or either of them, contemplates.

But my chief objection is common to both, and that is the time has not come and sufficient information is not now before Congress to warrant it in saying that such defects have been developed in the operation of our financial system as to require that something shall be done not conceived of in the infancy of this Government, when it was experimenting with policies, when its business institutions were undeveloped, when its railroads and telegraphs were unthought of, when there was not that coherency in business between one section of the country and another which makes it easier to do business than ever before, and when there had not been introduced and in successful operation the many striking economies in the conduct of business which are now in existence. I know that the necessary preliminary investigation has not been made and that we are proceeding to legislate under the pressure of a situation made no less acute by the predatory elements of the national banks because they have interests to promote at this time. Investigation can be made now through official sources to an extent that will satisfy ordinary purposes, but I believe that the first duty of the Congress is to ascertain the cause of the panic, to the end that we may proceed advisedly and act decisively. I do not believe that any Government upon the face of the civilized earth would have permitted an event of the character of the late panic, one which completely convulsed and demoralized for the time the commercial peace and prosperity of the country, to pass without an investigation which would have promptly and definitely disclosed its causes, and on the foundation of the knowledge thus acquired formulated and adopted a remedy that would have made impossible the recurrence of a similar event produced by the same causes.

Such an investigation as I have made in the matter justifies me in saying that the panic is directly traceable to the operations on the New York Stock Exchange, the cotton exchange, and the grain exchanges of the country. I shall take a few minutes to say something about that, and then I will desist.

It is a demonstrated fact, which admits of no dispute, that about $1,000,000,000 of the loanable capital of the country is employed constantly in financing the so-called deals of the gambling operations on the New York Stock Exchange. The report made to the Comptroller as late as the 22d day of August discloses the fact that the national banks of New York had $251,000,000 loaned on stock-exchange securities—that is, on call loan, without personal indorsement, and secured by stocks and bonds.

There were sold upon that exchange last year 300,000,000 shares of stock—an unthinkable amount. There was put into the treasury of the State of New York from the State tax on those transactions $6,000,000. In other words, the State of New York derived a privilege tax of $500,000 a month for permitting that business to be conducted. The commission which the so-called "brokers" earned by reason of these transactions, as the rake-off on these gambling operations, amounted to $50,000,000. There are 1,100 members, whose so-called seat or membership is worth $52,500 each, or $57,500,000 for the privilege of engaging in that sort of business. It is not pretended by those who think they know, because that is about as definite as you can get at it—they keep their proceedings to themselves; what gets out is merely in an incidental and fragmentary way—that 99 per cent of the transactions are mere settlements of differences on gambling operations, pure and simple.

No one pretends to defend the stock exchange against that charge, made over and over again. A lawsuit took place not long since in the city of Chicago, where it became necessary to investigate the character of business carried on by the grain exchange there. An issue was made as to the extent and character of the transactions there, and the proof showed that 95 per cent of the transactions on the grain exchange were a mere settlement of the matter of differences, and this in a case where the brokers made the greatest efforts to prove delivery by warehouse certificates or otherwise.

I think as long as such institutions exist, unless it is the purpose of Congress to adopt them as a legitimate part of the business establishment of the country, we should not increase the volume of currency so as to make provision for their nefarious schemes, and to thus treat it as a proper and commendable business institution. But if its existence is a necessary and natural evolution of the business of our complex society, as one of the judges of the Supreme Court denominated it, then this bill ought not to pass until we determine for ourselves whether or not the time has come when that business should be put down, or if it should not be, then that we shall understand it as being a part of the recognized business system of the country that must be provided for accordingly.

I grant you that if a billion dollars of loanable capital of this country must be kept involved in stock exchange deals and not be subject to the control of legitimate business interests of the country; or, to express it differently, if a billion dollars of the loanable capital of the country must be devoted constantly to gaming—then, necessarily, it must exert a very considerable influence upon the disturbance of prices, for the methods of that institution make it necessary for it to disturb prices in order to make business. It exists by that sort of financial disorder, and it could not live six months without it.

These institutions do not deal in stable stocks, except on rare occasions. The stock of reputable national banks are never made the subject of speculation there. In 1907 there were two railroad companies of whose stock there was sold, or, rather, the brokers sold (the roads did not have anything to do with it), more than thirty times the number of shares that were ever issued.

I believe this is about all I intend to say just at this time. I had intended to deal somewhat at length with several aspects of the questions involved on this occasion, but I find myself unable to do it now. My purpose has been to say in a word why I should not vote for either the committee bill or the substitute. I am greatly disappointed to find myself unable to do so at this time. I may take occasion to say something hereafter along the lines I intended to pursue this morning. But as I take my seat I want to emphasize that in my opinion the time has arrived when, in the judgment of disinterested business men of the country, the affairs of the New York Stock Exchange and the other stock exchanges must be looked into. This belief is almost universal among them. The available proof justifies this sentiment, which is almost universally entertained.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Would it interrupt the Senator to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have listened intently to what the Senator has said. Do I understand this to be the situation? I ask for information because the Senator has studied it and I have not. The banks throughout the country, in order to get the most interest that they can, deposit their money with the banks in New York, and the banks in New York loan out the money thus accumulated on call to transact the stock-gambling operations which the Senator has described; then, when all of the money that is drawn to New York from all over the country is so locked up that upon the call of the contributing banks to the banks of deposit in New York the country banks will not get it. Is that the situation?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the point the Senator makes against both the minority and the majority bill is that this excess of emergency currency would merely relieve the situation created in New York in the way the Senator has described? Would it not follow then that while it would more directly help the stock exchange transactions it would also in that very way relieve the money, so that the banks could send it back to the banks from which they got it?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. But I do not think that it is wise legislation to provide a benefit for the stock-exchange gamblers in order that the country bank may have the privilege of drawing its own money out of the New York bank. I do not think we ought to pay tribute to the stock exchange to that extent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am somewhat inclined to agree with the Senator in what he has said. His speech is very clear and very informing—it is one of the best speeches yet made in its keen intelligence and lucid statements, and I wanted to get the Senator's exact views as to the conclusion to which it necessarily comes. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The banks, Mr. President, are induced largely to send money to New York to get interest. But they have another reason, very substantial with them. There comes a time when the country banks have to rediscount paper in order to carry on the business of the several localities where they do business. They are accommodated in return in proportion to the state of the account they keep with the central bank, so that they thus find some mutuality about the business of depositing in legitimate bank operations. They have no difficulty about getting a bank ordinarily——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator is also quite well aware that it is for the interest of the country banks to keep an account in New York entirely aside from any question of interest or any other question. It is almost a necessity for the country banks in the matter of exchanges to keep an account in New York, whether they get any interest for it or not.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will say that the country banks usually have business connections and customers that require frequently the drawing of drafts on New York.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is undoubtedly true of almost every bank in the United States that they keep an account in New York. If the Senator should go to a bank in Arkansas and get a check to pay a bill in Chicago, or in San Francisco, or anywhere else, they would give him a draft or a check on New York, probably. New York is the great financial center of the country, and entirely aside from any stock speculative movements there, it is important that country banks and the banks of the country generally should keep accounts in New York.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is true, partially.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arkansas will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether he thinks it is necessary to accumulate in New York the vast amount of reserves of the banks throughout the country in order to enable those banks to conduct the simple transactions of exchange on New York?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir; very cheerfully.

Mr. ALDRICH. Of course there are varying amounts held by the New York banks of the banks throughout the country. There are varying amounts dependent upon the season and upon the demands in various parts of the country. I think myself that there is always a tendency to accumulate too much money in the banks of New York and too much of a temptation to use it for other purposes than the legitimate purposes of trade. I agree perfectly with the Senator from Arkansas to that extent, but in ordinary seasons the banks must keep an account in New York. That is entirely independent of the question of reserves.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Everyone will agree with what the Senator says, but is it not true that it is a comparatively small portion?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it is much the larger portion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You think it is much the larger portion?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have had a very wrong impression. My impression has been that it was a small portion. My impression had been that while some of the money went there for legitimate purposes of exchange, most of it was accumulated there because the country banks found that in that way they could earn the largest possible interest on their money. I am glad the Senator corrects me.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the fact that one-half of the lawful reserves of the country banks and one-half of the lawful reserves of the reserve city banks go to New York.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not necessarily.

Mr. NEWLANDS. You will find by the statistics of last year that one-half of the reserves of the country banks was deposited in other banks and that one-half of the reserves in the reserve city banks was deposited in the central reserve city of New York.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are three central reserve cities.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, the bulk of it was deposited in New York. I do not suppose the Senator will contend for a moment that one-half or one-quarter of that large amount is necessary to be deposited by the country banks and the reserve city banks in New York in order to conduct the ordinary transactions of exchange.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should say, most assuredly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Most cheerfully.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that, so far as I understand his contention, he is not so much concerned as to whether the local banks or country banks shall have a deposit in New York against which they can check as he is concerned about our legislating here so that when those banks call for their money they can get it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator is exactly right; and I also want to stop stock gambling, as a means to this end.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island, whose earnest efforts to better the financial condition I, for one, believe in, although I do not agree with his remedy, will aid us or will himself take the lead in furnishing some method by which the country banks can get their own money when they want it, and not let the stock gamblers hold it in their grasp by conditions which we encourage by our legislation.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I merely wish to say in this connection that all we need is a Comptroller of the Currency who will enforce the law, and then the New York banks will either give the country banks their money or he will put the New York banks in the hands of a bank examiner.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is a theoretical remedy.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply say that is the law.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is the law that whenever a national bank makes default in the payment of its indebtedness it is subject to be proceeded against for insolvency.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Arkansas will agree with me that it is better the New York bank should be closed up for failing to pay its obligations than that a country bank should be closed up because it could not pay its obligations.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I agree entirely with the Senator as an abstract proposition. But the practical difficulty with the attempt to apply a remedy would be that while the Comptroller would close the recalcitrant bank, the resulting demoralization would cause excited depositors to close a dozen more.

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire to impress upon the Senator, and I desire to repeat, that the people of this country will never permit again, in my judgment, the banks to suspend payment in the arbitrary way they did last October. I said that in my first speech, and I repeat it now.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator has a great reputation as a historian, but I would not trust him much as a prophet if he makes that declaration. Whenever the same necessity presents itself they will do the same thing over.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think not.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I know the complete terror that exists in the country when the people are uncertain about their bank balances. The people did not lose confidence in the banks in 99 per cent of the territory of the country. They exhibited a forbearance that was absolutely monumental.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, in my experience last fall I discovered that the greatest concern of the people in every town which I visited was that they could not get their own money out of their own banks, because New York had had a chill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is true.

Mr. TILLMAN. Old Confidence had taken to the woods in New York, and therefore he was in hiding all over Texas, Oklahoma, Missouri, and everywhere else I went.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is true. Wherever the banking operations of the neighborhood in their ultimate effect ended up in New York there was a local panic, because of New York conditions and not conditions at home. If the banks of the South and West had secured possession of their own money they would have never known that there was a panic raging, but it was prearranged that they should not do that. From June until the 1st of September the banks of the South and West were induced to make loans to the national banks in New York by tempting offers of high interest rates on high-grade, short-time paper. I saw a list of it in my home town, offering 7 per cent on such paper. The money was thus lured into the banks of New York, not by the mere low rate of interest on reserves which they had there, but the New York banks drew many millions there by paying as high as 7 per cent interest on it for a short time. The local banks of course supposed that before they would need it for local use the paper would mature and they would have credit for it with the banks of New York and could draw it out as necessity required. But when the time came their calculations miscarried, with the result we now know.

I am about through, Mr. President. I see the Senator from Rhode Island present. There is just one feature of his bill more than any other that I think ought to receive attention. He left out a provision for keeping the reserves at home that I think ought to be in, and he has put in a provision that the national banks may retire their normal circulation at will. Parliamentary master that he is, I would discredit my own estimate of him if I believed he would leave the one out and put the other in, except for the purpose of having something with which to negotiate when he comes to hold the inevitable parley with the almost persuaded. I do not believe he intends to pass the bill with a provision that all normal circulation can be retired at will. I do not believe that he has overlooked the fact that necessity requires some modification of the law in regard to reserves. I am opposed to permitting the local banks to deposit the reserve anywhere. If they have money that they choose to deposit upon checking account, that is a different proposition altogether, having nothing whatever to do with the reserve. That is to be regulated by the volume of business that passes between two banks. That is a legitimate use of funds. But I do not believe that that reserve is dead money, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], or probably my friend from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], characterized it the other day. No such fact is true. It is just as much a part of the working capital of the bank as any other dollar in the bank.

It is not an amount of money at all; it is the mere warning to the bankers that when they reach the limit of 15 per cent of the deposits they must thereafter be careful.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I will say to the Senator that it was I who spoke of it as dead capital. I stated that I did not believe it was the intention of Congress in enacting the law that it should be treated as dead capital, but that it should be utilized for the purpose of paying the checks drawn upon this reserve; that the reserve was to be so much that could not be loaned out.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. On time loans.

Mr. MCLAURIN. On time loans by the banks.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Even that is not enforced by a penalty. It may be done over and over again and there is no penalty; no presumption of wrongdoing that grows out of it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I mean to be perfectly frank with my friend the Senator from Arkansas. I will say with reference to the $9,000,000 limitation that two years ago, I think it was, we raised the limit on retirement from $3,000,000 to $9,000,000. I then stated that personally I thought there was no occasion, especially as we left the matter entirely in the control of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, to make that limitation. The Senate did not then agree with me, and I have a notion that they will not agree with me now. I expect that the limitation retirement of $9,000,000 per month, except as to emergency currency, will be retained in the bill.

So far as the question of reserves is concerned, I said when the bill was reported that the committee left it out because it would lead, we thought, to a long discussion. We have had the long discussion anyhow. So I am now disposed, if I can, to get some provision affecting the reserves that will be satisfactory to Senators on both sides of the Chamber, and I want to do the very best thing possible.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. And so it has come to pass so soon that my standing as a prophet is recognized.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether he would be willing also to fix the relation between capital and loans so as to prevent a bank from loaning out its depositors' money in excess, say, of seven or ten times the amount of its capital?

Let me say in this connection that the capital is the security of the depositors as much as the reserve. Good banking requires that the reserves should be at least 15 or 20 per cent and the capital should be at least 15 or 20 per cent. The average of the national banks of the country is about 20 per cent. Now, would it not be wise to make that average compulsory, so that we may have some of the weak banks secured only by reserve, with their insufficient capital, and others can be secured by the reserve required by law and also by sufficient capital?

Mr. ALDRICH. I regret that I can not answer that in the time of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will be through in five minutes. The character of the provision in regard to the reserve that would please me would be one affirmatively requiring a bank to keep the reserve at home, and another provision denying to a national bank the right to pay interest to any other national bank upon a demand loan or a checking account, usually called "daily balances."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator please repeat the latter remark?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I say I would not only require the bank to keep a reserve at home, but I would deny to any national bank the right to pay any other national bank interest on a demand loan or a checking account. Then only such deposits would be kept in a national bank as the legitimate business of exchange would require, the interest would not enter into the question, and whether the reserves could be used at home or not would not enter into it. The matter would be disposed of on its merits as a business proposition to the mutual advantage of the two parties in interest.

Now, as I said, the reserve is as much a part of the working capital of the bank as any other dollar in it. Strangely enough that question got to the Supreme Court of the United States. There is a provision in the banking law that if a stockholder sells his stock after he knows the bank is insolvent, or after he has such knowledge of circumstances which followed up reasonably would lead to that knowledge, he does not escape the double liability by reason of transferring his stock to an insolvent transferee.

In the reported case the stockholder sold his stock, and the question arose as to whether he had knowledge at the time he disposed of it that the bank was in a failing condition, it having subsequently failed. One of the reasons advanced to show why he knew the bank was insolvent was that its published statements repeatedly showed the fact that its reserve invariably went below the legal limit. It was argued that he should have taken notice of that fact and by diligently following it up to ascertain the fact that the bank was insolvent. The Supreme Court, in an opinion written by Judge White, said that under the law he was not required to take any notice of it at all. The court refused to decide whether the provision is a directory or a mandatory statute. Permitting the reserve to run below the limit is not followed by any penalty. It depends upon the action of the Comptroller of the Currency in first giving the offending bank thirty days' notice to replenish the reserve, and a failure even then does not involve any consequence or charge anybody with notice of the irregularity. It is only when the Comptroller of the Currency reports to the Secretary of the Treasury that that particular delinquency has been kept up so long as to justify him in placing a receiver in charge that it is done by direction of the Secretary and not by the Comptroller.

The course of dealing with it is to virtually constitute the reserve provision in the national banking law a mere warning to bankers. They must be a little careful when they reach a certain point in their business. Of course it is their duty to pay everybody they owe, and it must be done whether the cash on hand is below 15 per cent or not.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator will agree with me that it has an entirely different signification as applied to the officers of the Treasury. They are bound to take notice of it, and there are certain obligations on their part and on the part of the bank officers of which they must take notice.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is very true that the Comptroller of the Currency may take notice of it, but he will take under view the entire statement of the bank in doing so; if he, from this, finds that there is no good reason for precipitating an event that must have a demoralizing influence in the community, he will overlook the matter with an admonition.

If there are discounts which are properly secured, and the investments of the bank are of a character that indicate that there has been a judicious use of its money, and that the reserve was encroached upon temporarily to relieve some situation that seemed to justify such conduct, I take it for granted the Comptroller would pay very little attention to it; and if he did, before any step could be taken against that bank, such action must be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

So I believe there is a widespread misapprehension about this matter of the reserve. I know my knowledge of the subject is of very recent acquisition, and is largely the result of investigations made since I have been here this session. I believe it to be a wise provision to require the banks to respect the reserve limitations. The idea of the necessity for a reserve was drawn from the experience and observation of bankers long before the national-banking system was created. The national act simply concreted that into a statute and made it a rule of law.

Now, I am going to make just one reference to what I think is another pernicious defect in the bill of the Senator from Rhode Island. He provides that the interest on this emergency circulation—in the bill he calls it a tax—shall not be paid on the sum delivered by Treasury officials to the banks, but it shall be paid on the average monthly amount of such notes so issued and in circulation.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the language of the existing law. Of course if the money is in circulation, it has been delivered to the banks. If the Senator was right in his criticism, of course the language needs to be changed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator's knowledge of banking law is so much better than mine that I will have to be pretty well satisfied about a proposition before I would antagonize him. But if he will look at the returns of the amount of tax paid on the normal circulation of national banks, he will find the volume is about $15,000,000 less than that delivered to the banks.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator will find that the difference grows out of the deposits of lawful money to retire circulation.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Here is the report of the reporting banks; none of them are in liquidation, voluntary or otherwise.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly; it is my purpose that they should pay a tax on all the money delivered to them.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is not the meaning of the provision now in the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to the provision, if such is not already covered by the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If that is the purpose, it must be more plainly provided for.

Mr. ALDRICH. We will see that it is in, if it is not in already.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think you will find there are on deposit to secure the circulation of national banks, $619,000,000 in round numbers. The Comptroller delivered to the national banks depositing those bonds $611,000,000 of notes. They had outstanding or in circulation $601,000,000. They have practically $8,000,000 less than they have bonds on deposit with the Treasury authorizing them to take out circulation. They took out $8,000,000 less. The Comptroller delivered to them $8,000,000 less than the bonds on file with him warranted them in receiving, and this to save simply the one-half of 1 per cent tax, leaving $8,000,000 in the hands of the Treasury unissued.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that discrepancy grows out of the fact that some small banks which are required by law to deposit the minimum amount of United States bonds never take out any circulation at all.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. There are only three such, with an aggregate capital of $75,000. Many have not taken out the authorized circulation because they thereby save the tax. I would not think that, in view of this circumstance, a very strong case was made out in favor of an emergency circulation. Consider here the question of retiring currency. I have a communication here from the Comptroller of the Currency showing that he had on file, on the 27th of February, applications to retire $39,438,000. In January the banks retired $9,000,000; in February they retired $8,898,500; in March they have applications already to retire $8,999,500; in April, $8,407,000; in May, $3,583,000; and in June, $450,000. These applications to retire are permitted in the order in which the applications are filed.

Mr. TILLMAN. First come first served.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. First come first served. It would not seem like there was any very great urgency about providing an emergency issue when they are retiring actual money in $40,000,000 bunches to save one-half of 1 per cent annual tax.

In the face of that sort of practical demonstration of belief on the part of the national banks themselves there would not seem to be a very overwhelming necessity for giving them permission to circulate $500,000,000 of emergency currency, at an interest cost of 6 per cent per annum, when they say they can not profitably use normal currency that the Government pays them about 1 per cent bonus for taking.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Arkansas understands the explanation of these large retirements now? There was an extraordinary issue of currency made under circumstances last fall which were very unusual. There were fifty, sixty, or seventy million dollars added to the bank-note currency under pressure of the crisis. There is now no use for that money, and the banks, of course, necessarily retire it. That is the whole theory of the law.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Instead of retiring their own money, why have they not returned to the vaults of the Treasury the Government money loaned to them without interest? Have they not retired their own issues for the purpose of saving the one-half of 1 per cent tax? Why do they not return to the vaults of the Treasury more than $200,000,000 of public money for which they pay no interest?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is an entirely different proposition. One is a question of currency and the other is a question of reserves.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The explanation given is that the national banks withdrew United States bonds which were held as security for public deposits and replaced them with railroad bonds, State bonds, and other bonds, under agreement with the Comptroller of the Currency, and took out additional circulation on the national bonds. They had to pay a 2 per cent bonus for the right to use the nonofficial bonds—the State bonds and railroad bonds—and they wanted to get rid of paying that by retiring this money. They would then only be compelled to pay the one-half of 1 per cent tax and would be relieved of the necessity of keeping the railroad bonds and State bonds on deposit to secure the national deposits.

It demonstrates the fact that we have money enough and that what we want done by legislation and what the demands of the present occasion require is that the money now in circulation shall be devoted to legitimate business purposes. With that ascertained, I do not think there will be any necessity for emergency legislation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. As a practical question, does not this amount of Government deposits of $222,000,000 serve as an emergency currency?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Is there any good reason why the banks should not pay interest on that emergency currency as well as on the proposed currency provided for in this bill?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No good reason has ever occurred to me. It may have occurred to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, two years ago, I think it was—possibly five years ago—I reported a bill from the Committee on Finance requiring banks to pay not more than 1½ per cent upon Government deposits. The bill came into the Senate, and almost every lawyer in the Senate—I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] was not then a Member of the body—almost every lawyer in the Senate opposed the bill. I remember very well the arguments made by the then Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Spooner, and the former Senator from Alabama, Mr. Morgan. The claim then made was—and I shall take occasion to have that debate reprinted in the RECORD—that by taking interest on such Government deposits it entirely changed the nature of the transaction; that we would thereby make it a loan and make the Government the general creditor of the banks, and that it was important from every standpoint that we should not change the relation between the banks and the Government. Whether that contention was correct or not, I do not know. In my judgment there is no good reason, unless it is a legal reason, why the banks should not pay interest on Government deposits.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have only to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that if he will prepare such a bill and bring it in here again——

Mr. TILLMAN. With 3 per cent on it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If the Senator from Rhode Island will bring it in just at the same rate, I think I may venture to say that there are some of us over here who have made a living practicing law who will not raise that objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I should like to remind the Senator from Arkansas that I myself introduced a bill to that effect, which has been pending before the Finance Committee since prior to the holiday recess.

Mr. TILLMAN. At what rate of interest?

Mr. CULBERSON. Two, 4 and 6 per cent, regulated according to crop movement.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I should be very much delighted to vote for the bill proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], though as to the 6 per cent interest, I do not know whether or not that is reasonable, under all the circumstances; the banks must have it at a rate that will enable them to use it as some profit to themselves. But I should like the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to bring forward his interest provision that was defeated; that ought to be regarded in parliamentary history as a very remarkable bill. A bill favorably reported from the Finance Committee, and having the indorsement of the Senator from Rhode Island on such a meritorious basis as that, it seems to me, ought not to have been defeated, and I am amazed that it was defeated by the efforts of lawyers on the minority side. There must have been some other reason for opposing its passage. I am not familiar with any of its provisions.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was defeated by the Senators sitting upon the other side of this aisle. If I might be permitted to use a phrase which perhaps is not exactly parliamentary, I would say it was defeated by a filibustering proceeding.

Mr. TILLMAN. How long ago?

Mr. ALDRICH. Five years ago.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think we have learned something over here since then.

Mr. ALDRICH. Several Senators who are within the sound of my voice remember very well how that bill was defeated. It was talked to death.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I venture to say, looking at the Senator from Texas, that he took no part in that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think he did not.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Texas was in favor of that bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Texas made a speech in favor of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. What Senators opposed it?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not like to refer to Senators by name, but if the Senator will look up the record he will find who they were. They were certainly not Republican Senators.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. With pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] if he does not recall the fact that during the consideration of the last financial bill here at the last session I offered an amendment to compel the banks to pay interest on Government deposits, and that he, among other Senators, strenuously opposed it?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Every Senator on this side of the Chamber voted for it.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; the Senator is mistaken. I think I made exactly the same statement I make now, that the lawyers of the Senate at that time believed that it ought not to be done for reasons of public policy and in consideration of the legal rights of the Government. Now, if I can be convinced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that the lawyers who opposed that bill were wrong in their statement and that no public interest of a contract nature is involved, I shall certainly be glad, for one, to vote for a proposition to require the payment of interest upon Government deposits.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator from Rhode Island another question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota for that purpose?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. What is the difference between a Government deposit in a national bank and the deposit of a national bank with a central reserve bank that justifies in one case the payment of 2 per cent interest and in the other case none? Is there any difference in the legal relation of the two deposits?

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator from Minnesota, there is absolutely no analogy between the two cases. In the case of Government deposits, the former Senator from Wisconsin and the former Senator from Alabama both contended that by an unbroken line of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States Government money in a national-bank depositary was money in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course.

Mr. ALDRICH. And that to put it in the form of a loan would change the nature of the transaction.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I wish to say that I was one of those who opposed the bill introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] of which mention has just been made. I did not oppose it because it proposed to require the banks to pay interest, except that the banks were not required in that bill to pay as much interest as I think they ought to be required to pay the Government, inasmuch as it loans them the money. I undertook to make an argument here against that bill. I took the floor and talked some ten minutes, I reckon, when other Senators on both sides of the Chamber got in and spoke until within five minutes, I believe it was, of 12 o'clock, when the Senator from Rhode Island suggested that the street cars would stop at 12 o'clock, and moved that the Senate adjourn. I then stated that I wanted it understood that when the bill came before the Senate the next day I would have the floor, but the bill never did come up again, and I never did get an opportunity to present my objections to it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Will the Senator explain why he opposed it?

Mr. McLAURIN. No; I will not explain, Mr. President, why I opposed that bill. If another bill just like it shall be introduced, I will explain why I oppose that bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Then the Senator is not in favor of another bill along the same line?

Mr. McLAURIN. No, sir. I will say at the proper time why I shall oppose such a bill if it shall hereafter be introduced. The bill to which the Senator from Rhode Island referred is dead by limitation and there is no necessity for arguing about it; but I will argue any other bill that comes up if my judgment is against the adoption of it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I did not intend to occupy more than ten minutes and if I had not been interrupted I do not think I should have occupied more than that time. I do not intimate any dissatisfaction with these interruptions; all have added to the interest of the occasion. I simply wanted to say that I am opposed to any emergency financial legislation at this time, in view of the demand prevalent in the country for an investigation of stock-exchange conditions, and I do not think this bill or any legislation of this character should be enacted in advance of such investigation.

I had prepared a somewhat more extended statement of my views on the general question, but I do not feel able at this time to state them. In deference to the minority of the Finance Committee, however, I thought that I would say why I am not going to vote for the bill which is proposed by the Senator from Texas as a substitute for the bill of the majority, and that I would take the liberty of calling attention to one or two defects that I thought were in that bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment, and I only detain it at all for the purpose of saying to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] that he has not caught the purpose of the minority and does not understand, as it appears to me, the different principles upon which the minority substitute and the majority bill are constructed. He complains against the minority substitute that it does not distribute the money amongst all the banks. I call his attention to the fact that under the minority substitute the Secretary of the Treasury may not only place it in those banks which are now depositaries, but may designate banks as depositaries for the special and single purpose of this bill.

I drew that deliberately so that if the Secretary of the Treasury wanted to put money in a particular locality where there was no Federal depositary he could make one; and, in order to obviate the possibility that after having placed Federal money in the banks the Government would assume some kind of Federal supervision or control over it, I limited it to the banks designated as depositaries for this purpose, leaving untouched the general authority over the banks designated as depositaries for general and ordinary purposes.

The Senator from Arkansas also complains against my distribution of this money according to the population of the States. I must confess that to my mind that is a most singular complaint in view of what he afterwards said. I drew that limitation for the express purpose of making it impossible for the New York gamblers to obtain the money that the industrious people of Texas and Arkansas might need in the conduct of their legitimate occupations.

I recognize as well as any man that the per capita basis is not an exact and scientific basis for the distribution of money. I perfectly understand that communities and States, the same as individuals, need money according to the volume of their business, and not according to the enumeration of their heads; but, as it is impossible to measure the volume of business and comparatively easy to count the number of people, the world has universally accepted the per capita basis as correct in these matters.

The money that is proposed to be deposited under the substitute belongs to the people of the United States. It does not belong to them according to their wealth, according to their industry, or according to their business. It belongs to them man and man alike, because their labor and their property in proportion must pay the taxes that would redeem it, and their lives and their safety must defend the government which issues it. Therefore, when I came to place the people's money among the people, I placed it according to their right of ownership in it, and that right of ownership is a per capita, and not a business one.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have no complaint to make about the statement as to who owns the money ultimately, but it encounters two limitations. You assign to some States more than they could avail themselves of if they invested the entire surplus and capital of every national bank in the State. For instance, take the State of Arkansas. Under a per capita distribution we would be entitled to some $10,000,000, but the entire surplus and capital of the national banks of the State is only $4,999,000.

Mr. BAILEY. The substitute does not limit this as the majority bill does, according to capital and surplus.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I know, but that would be their capacity to acquire it. There are two limitations—one of population and the other of ability. Where would they get the money? They have not got banking capital and surplus, to say nothing of the circulation that is out against their capital stock, that would entitle them to acquire half of it.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is mistaken. I do not limit the right to deposit according to the capital of the bank.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly; but according to the capacity they have to enjoy the privileges which you give to them.

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all. The bank with only $50,000 capital might, under the substitute bill, secure $100,000 deposits.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Of course, if they use deposits to acquire circulation.

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all. It is just a question of their ability to give security. That is all.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. But their ability to give security, I presume, bears some relation to the amount of money they have invested in the business, which is the capital and surplus.

Mr. BAILEY. That is ordinarily true, Mr. President, but it frequently happens that State, national, and other banks, when they need security and do not have it of their own, borrow it from individuals and other institutions. In other words, I have no doubt a bank in Arkansas, with ample security, could borrow from its correspondents in other places, who might have them, any kind of bonds that were needed to secure a Government deposit under the present law. However, if the people of Arkansas have only a certain amount of capital and they have no security to offer, I think you would not expect them to get the money. But the substitute does not limit it as the committee bill does. The bill requires that the banks shall have their capital paid up; that they shall have a surplus, and then that they shall have taken out 50 per cent of their circulation.

The Senator from Arkansas must understand that another and a most fundamental difference between the bill and the substitute is that, under the majority bill, if the banks did not want to relieve the panic the panic would not be relieved. If the banks were not willing to take out this circulation the country would be left to suffer for the want of it; but, under the substitute as I have drawn it, an officer of the Government, with a sworn duty to perform and a high obligation to the people, judges whether or not there shall be an increase in the currency; and if there is necessity, under his oath of office, he relieves it. Under my substitute he is not compelled to wait, as he is under the majority bill, until the banks apply. The substitute compels him to make the deposit.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Deposit without security?

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir; with security.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Suppose the bank has not got it?

Mr. BAILEY. Then the bank simply can not take the deposit.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Suppose the bank is not willing to pledge its credit and to change the character of its assets?

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. President, there is no way to compel that bank to do it, except if it is already a depositary you simply strip it of its privilege as a depositary not only then, but thereafter.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. How would that help the local situation financially?

Mr. BAILEY. That would help it very materially in this way. The Senator from Arkansas said in the Senate a few moments ago that it was such a privilege that only a few hundred banks—fourteen hundred, I believe, out of 6,000—had been so designated. Now that fourteen hundred would not be willing to surrender their rights as depositaries because they could not comply with the law. It is worth something to a bank to write on its window—I suppose it is, because every one entitled to do so writes it on its window—that it is a depositary of the United States. Assuming that that privilege is worth something, even for the purpose of advertising, they would not have it understood that they were compelled to surrender it because they were not equipped to give the security.

I have no difficulty about that. I have no doubt in the world that if this bill should become a law, or if my substitute, which I think is much better, should become a law, the banks in the South and West would immediately secure bonds as fast as those bonds were issued by municipalities, States, and counties. In other words, if a bank already in existence at the town of Gainesville, in Texas, were to find that city issuing its bonds for any municipal purpose, they would not allow those bonds to be sold, as they now are and as they have been for many years, to the East, but they would take a part of their capital or surplus, or a part of each, if necessary, and they would invest it in those bonds. They would lay them aside in their vaults to provide for precisely these emergencies when they should arise, and in twenty years—and mark you, Mr. President, we are not legislating for a day; we are legislating for all the days to come—and in twenty years every bank in the South would be equipped with a fair amount of these bonds.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Would not that depend——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Would not that depend upon the rate of interest that money could earn in the neighborhood?

Mr. BAILEY. In some measure it would, and yet it would not be determined entirely by that for this reason: Here is a bank——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Just one other question, so that the Senator may understand me.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Do you think a bank would carry, for instance, a 4 per cent bond—you can float in the East a 4 per cent bond if it is secured, but it will not float in Arkansas, and I do not know what would be a fair rate in Texas—but assuming the rate to be 4 per cent or 5 per cent, do you suppose a bank would carry such a bond for nine or ten years in order to avoid a panic that might happen during the tenth year? Panics do not come often enough, emergencies do not arise often enough to justify the banks in lending money out for half or two-thirds of what they could get from private customers.

Mr. BAILEY. If a bank could know that a panic was not coming for ten years, of course it would not do so; it would wait until the year the panic was to come, and then buy the bonds; but banks can never calculate on that. They can never tell certainly when these disturbances will occur. Like the recent one, they come unexpectedly, and a prudent bank manager——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Suppose the panic came about as this one did. There was no local want of money. There were ample funds in the South and West to conduct all the business that the people there were engaged in, and they simply wanted to get their money that was impounded somewhere else. Then, why would they apply for money to relieve the situation caused by the misconduct of somebody else, or due to the disability of somebody else?

Mr. BAILEY. If New York's misconduct affected nobody but New York I would have precious little interest in it; but when it affects the remainder of the country I want to provide that the rest of the country may protect itself against the misconduct of New York. If the gamblers simply gambled with and distressed each other we could afford to let them gamble on to their hearts' content. But I do not care what produces a panic—gambling or what else—when a panic comes everybody suffers; and I should like to relieve the innocent people even from the consequences of the acts of the guilty stock gamblers.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish for a moment, before I am diverted from that point. Ordinarily, of course, a bank would not take part of its capital and invest it in 5 per cent bonds when it could realize 8 per cent on commercial loans. But when you reflect that the 5 per cent bond is an absolute security and the 8 per cent loan not only involves the value of the use of the money, but involves the chance of loss and the risk of delay and cost in collecting it, a 5 per cent loan which is absolutely secure is better than an 8 per cent commercial loan, and when you add to the absolute security of the 5 per cent loan the privilege of being converted into money on an occasion when money is much needed, I have no hesitation in saying that any wise and prudent bank manager would take a part of his capital and invest it in these bonds, though they bear a lower rate of interest than commercial loans.

Mr. President, the banks of the United States now return to their stockholders a larger per cent than any other legitimate and safe business—more than 12 per cent per annum. Surely, if they are managed by men of common prudence, they would be willing to reduce their dividends a little in order to make their capital absolutely secure, and while this may not make it absolutely secure, it makes it infinitely more secure than it is to-day.

Now, to return to the other matter——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to suggest—the thought came into my mind while the discussion about the per capita issue of emergency money was being bandied back and forth between the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Arkansas—that what the Senator from Arkansas complained of or suggested as a criticism was that Arkansas would never be able to take out the amount of money which the per capita basis would permit, and that unless there is some limitation provided New York might be enabled to gobble up the whole amount, and we do not want any more of that kind of thing if we can help ourselves.

Mr. BAILEY. And knowing New York's disposition, I know she would, to use the Senator's expressive phrase, "gobble it up," and I have therefore carefully provided that she can not do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to say a word there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I merely want to say a word in answer to a suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, who always looks upon these matters in a practical way. The Senator asked, Why should the banks buy these bonds or keep them? The Senator realizes that the banks must keep reserves. They keep a part of their reserves now in New York, and draw 2 per cent interest upon them. The rest of their reserve does not pay them any interest at all. The suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] is that bonds shall be held as a part of the banks' reserves—that is, to a limited extent. The banks would then be in this condition: Instead of their reserves paying them nothing at all, or 2 per cent when deposited in New York, they would have part of their reserves under their own control all the time, paying them 4 or 5 per cent interest, with the right at any moment to obtain money upon them instead of taking the chance of not getting their money from the New York reserve banks.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator is mistaken when he says "with the right at any moment to obtain money upon them." It seems to me it could only be had when the Secretary of the Treasury decided the conditions to be such that this emergency currency might be used——

Mr. ALDRICH. And undoubtedly any Secretary of the Treasury would so decide——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Any time they could make any money on those 4 per cent bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. Any time that the conditions in a locality demanded its use. No bank would apply unless there was good reason for it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will submit the proposition that outside of the city of New York there was no disarrangement of the business conditions or banking conditions that made it necessary to forecast any such outcome.

Mr. ALDRICH. There was not a bank in the United States that was not crippled or did not suspend payment, with very few exceptions. Whether the recent panic came from the conditions in New York I do not know, but I do know that when there is an absolute suspension in New York at any time it means a suspension of the business of the whole country. It is inevitable.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it is such an easy thing to blame our misfortunes and lay our shortcomings on somebody else that it is not surprising that the banks in the country which could not pay said they could not pay their customers because their New York correspondents would not pay them. I know that many of the country banks would not pay cash over their counters. In some of the cities of our great State they limited cash withdrawals to $20 a day.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. In our little town we have two small banks, and there was not a day that a man could not go there with a check and get every dollar that his checks called for.

Mr. BAILEY. And he could carry away in his pockets all the dollars he obtained, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. McLAURIN. But the banks could meet all their obligations.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I withdraw that remark, because the Senator from Mississippi lives in one of the most delightful communities in this world and among the best and bravest people. I was born near them. They do not love money half so well as they love truth and justice. It may be difficult to make money among them, but the money is safe after you have made it. You can lay it down and when you come back you can find it exactly where you left it. But it is true that Brandon, Miss., is not exactly a type of the busy and strenuous commercial life of the country. I know in our cities they limited men to $20 a day, and we almost reached the point of paraphrasing the Lord's prayer and saying to our banker, "Give us this day our daily allowance;" and we did not always get it. They were solvent. They all stood that storm. But they did not have as much money as their depositors wanted, and I am inclined to think that the bankers throughout the country acted with great wisdom and averted a very serious disaster by looking their customers in their faces and telling them they could not and would not pay their deposit accounts.

I say that for this reason: If the bankers paid their depositors, then they must have collected from the men who owed them, and with the depositor taking out at one window and the banker calling on his debtor to pay at the other window, we would have witnessed a ruinous sacrifice of property. The banks could not pay their depositors unless their debtors paid them, and I think it was wise on their part that they did not force a liquidation at that time.

But I did not rise to discuss that. I want to impress upon the Senator from Arkansas again that the difference between the bill of the committee and the substitute of the minority is as wide as the poles are apart. The committee not only allows the banks to issue the money, but allows them to determine when and how much money shall be issued.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator from Texas seems to be calling my attention to that. I will say to him that under your bill the Secretary of the Treasury might on his own initiative find some locality, and say "I think you ought to have $20,000 in your bank," and the banker would say "I have only bonds enough here," or "I do not choose to use bonds enough to issue more than $10,000." Have you any provision in your bill to make him take out $20,000?

Mr. BAILEY. I have not, and he could not be made to take more than he could secure. If he could secure but $10,000——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Suppose he would not?

Mr. BAILEY. I would rely upon a sensible Secretary of the Treasury to leave the $10,000 there to serve the uses and conveniences of that community.

Mr. President, we must lodge somewhere the power to determine when this money can be issued. You could not, to save your life, devise an automatic arrangement that would work itself. The Senator from Arkansas may take it and study it through the night and into the morning, and he can not draw a bill which does not leave it to somebody to initiate the issuance of this money. The Senator from Rhode Island leaves it to the banks to initiate it, and then to issue it upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. I recognize that the banks are engaged in a private business. Their first duty is to their stockholders. While they are citizens, and many of them patriotic and intelligent citizens—I will even go so far as to say that an overwhelming majority of them are intelligent and patriotic citizens—yet, sir, I will never commit to any private interest the power to issue the money of the United States and to determine when or how much of it shall be issued.

Rejecting, therefore, the theory of the bill of the committee, which, I grant you, is only an application of the present banking law, I propose to commit, and I was forced to commit to somebody, this great power to an officer of this Government, bound by a solemn oath and engaged by a high sense of duty to do whatever is best for the people of these United States. That, Mr. President, is my reason for conferring this discretion on the Secretary of the Treasury instead of the banks.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the Senator, there is only one trouble I see about the Senator's substitute. I am going to vote for it, but there is one trouble about it. I would not agree to vote for any permanent system of finance that provided that the Government should deposit money in banks to be loaned to the people.

Mr. BAILEY. You mean for the ordinary supply of currency?

Mr. CLAY. I would not.

Mr. BAILEY. Nor would I.

Mr. CLAY. I understand this simply to be an emergency currency, and in all probability the money issued under the system provided by the majority or the minority on account of the rate of interest fixed will return to the Treasury, except when an emergency shall arise. Then I do not understand the Senator from Texas to be in favor of any permanent system that would simply issue notes and deposit them in the banks and allow the banks to furnish the money to the people.

Mr. BAILEY. I would never agree to use the banks as a permanent and ordinary method of putting money in circulation. That is neither desirable nor necessary. The Government can provide from year to year the proper increase of the currency by the issuance of its promissory notes and the payment of its current obligations in those notes.

The Senator from Rhode Island asked the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], when that Senator was making his excellent and interesting address to the Senate, if he meant to say that he would create deficiencies merely for the sake of increasing the currency. I answer the Senator from Rhode Island that without the slightest hesitation I would do it. This Government rests under no higher obligations to the people than to provide them with an ample supply of currency, and I would meet and perform that duty in any necessary way, and I would not hesitate a moment when authorizing a great public work to issue bonds so far as was necessary and to issue the noninterest-bearing notes of the Government so far as it was safe. I would not hesitate one minute to deliberately remit a part of the people's taxes in any year in order to supply the country with currency. There is no danger in such a course.

It is as much the duty of the Government to supply the people with an abundant currency, taking care that it is not superabundant, as it is to levy taxes against them for its own support, and whenever the importation of gold fails to supply such an increase in our money as is required by our growth of population and commerce, I would unhesitatingly issue the notes of the United States. But it is utterly impossible to meet an emergency in that way, and the banks, in my judgment, are the only practical means of successfully dealing with such a condition.

But, Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senator from Maine, who has previously given notice, for taking his time, and have but a word more.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Maine loves to hear the Senator from Texas talk.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank you. I wanted the Senator from Arkansas to see the matter as it appears to us. I am satisfied the Senator would not turn both the issue of money and the determination as to its volume and as to the time of its issue over to the banks rather than to an officer of the Government.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I wish the Senator would indulge me one moment more.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If I thought that question was involved in it, or was decisive of any question, of course I would vote for many objectionable features rather than to commit myself to the proposition that national banks ought to have all control over the volume or the right to issue money; but, as I understand these two bills, there is no substantial difference on that particular point. The Senator is quite right, and he pays me a compliment, which I appreciate, when he says that I do not intend to permit national banks to control the volume of money or to have any definite voice in saying what that volume shall be.

Mr. BAILEY. But when the Senator votes against the substitute which we offer he does vote that as between the two systems he prefers the other.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Not at all. Now, what do you base that on?

Mr. BAILEY. Because a substitute is simply one proposition against the other. If you vote against the substitute, you vote that you prefer the original proposition over the substitute. That is the parliamentary effect of it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That may be, according to the Senator's judgment.

Mr. BAILEY. And that is what we——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. But I am opposed to both propositions.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the Senator might, if the substitute should be adopted as against the original measure, vote against the substitute on its passage. I have done that in my time. Believing that a substitute was better than a bill for which it was offered, I have supported the substitute, announcing that, though the substitute was better than the original bill, it was still not as good as it ought to be, and I reserved the right to vote against it if it should become the main proposition.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If there were any reason for announcing my adhesion to an abstract principle, I think I would do that myself. I see so definitely, or I think I do at least, that there should not be any such legislation as this, that I do not propose to vote for it partially. I say it is all out of place in advance of an investigation of that question. If a naked proposition involving the choice between the national banks issuing the circulating medium or the United States doing it in the form of Treasury notes, count me, without any further controversy on that proposition, in favor of the Treasury note.

Mr. BAILEY. I want right there to show the Senator from Arkansas how I have endeavored to take into consideration the views of gentlemen like him. It was said, and I believe truthfully said, that if you do not provide for the geographical distribution of this money, New York, occupying the highest financial eminence, would be the first to feel the breath of the coming storm, and it would take out the entire currency.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. You do not understand me as advocating that?

Mr. BAILEY. No. I believe that if New York got the whole of this money supply, the balance of the country would only get what New York might graciously choose to let it have; and remembering that New York in the recent stringency did not choose to let them have what belonged to them, I was unwilling to risk New York with what belonged to the rest of the country. Therefore I deliberately provided that it should be distributed among the States according to population. I also provided that an emergency might exist in one State without existing in all the States.

In other words, when the people of Arkansas or of Texas began to move the cotton crop, there might be such a business condition there as would warrant the Secretary of the Treasury in making deposits with them without feeling it incumbent upon him to make deposits in New York or Montana or California.

Not only so, Mr. President, but I then provided—and I think I have carefully provided—that the Secretary of the Treasury shall never under any circumstances deposit more of this emergency fund in any State than its pro rata share of it. It can never happen that New York, with her one-tenth of our population, can get more than one-tenth of this money, and therefore New York could not use Texas's part or Arkansas's part to gamble with.

The Senator from Arkansas complains that one State might not need its share and might not want it, and that I did not allow it then to be given to the States that did. The reason I would not allow that, Mr. President, was this: No State can tell within a day or a week or a month whether it will need emergency notes or not. If Texas did not promptly take out her share, and you then permit New York to take it out, it might happen that at the end of thirty days Texas would find herself in need of it, and as the limit would have been reached, Texas's money would be in New York and Texas would be left stripped and helpless in a great emergency. It was to prevent that condition that I deliberately provided in the substitute that the money belonging to one State should never be assigned to any other State. I not only protected Texas in her right to get her share, but I have rendered it impossible for New York to gamble upon the emergency fund provided for the other States.

Mr. President, it is easy to criticise, but it is difficult to construct. I claim no special excellence in that line. I have no pride of authorship. If gentlemen will draft a substitute that affirms the sovereign power of the Republic to issue the money of the people and denies that power to the banks, I will surrender my preference as to details and support it. I do not forget that it is impossible to apply a principle except according to some detail, and I do not forget that good details are essential to the wise application of sound principles; but if they will give me an agreement on the principle, I will yield to them on the details. What I desire above all else is to see the Democratic party record itself here and now as unchangeably in favor of the principle of Government money as against bank money.

MATERIAL FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. FRYE. The currency fever seems on. Two Senators have already spoken to me, who desire to be heard for a short while, ten minutes or so. I am inclined to accommodate them, but I should like to have the Senate accommodate me. Nobody has given notice of any speech for to-morrow morning immediately after the routine business. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution (S. R. 40) to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal may receive consideration to-morrow after the routine business. Then I will yield the floor, and the currency debate can go on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks that Senate joint resolution No. 40 be taken up for consideration immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FRYE. I am obliged to the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

BANK CAPITAL.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island whilst I renew the question which I asked him during the argument of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and that is whether, in addition to the requirement which he has already acquiesced in—that the banks should keep in their own vaults either the whole or a very much larger proportion of the reserves now required by law—he would be willing to add the requirement that no bank shall be permitted to loan out its depositors' money in excess of seven times the amount of its capital? The purpose of that would be to secure for the depositors the protection of adequate capital amounting to about 15 per cent of their bank loans.

The Senator from Rhode Island realizes that the depositors' moneys are loaned out, and the loans about equal the deposits, and that the security of the depositors is the reserve required by law and the capital of the banks.

The Senator will also bear in mind that there is no rule imposed by the present banking act regarding the relation of capital either to loans or deposits, and that whilst the average banking capital of the national banks and the average banking capital of the nation is entirely adequate, being about 30 per cent, I believe, of the deposits, yet as a matter of fact a great many banks, both national and State, are far below that requirement. I will ask the Senator whether he would favor an additional protection to the depositors in that line?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the bank system of New York prior to the war, which I imagine perhaps was the best of the American systems, had a limitation of this character. No bank should loan more than two and a half times its capital. As I stated in the remarks which I submitted to the Senate some time ago, twenty years ago, in 1887, the proportion between capital and loans in this country was as 1 to 2.61, being a little in excess of the New York limit. In 1907 the proportion was as 1 to 5.21, showing an increase in proportion to capital of almost double in the last twenty years.

I see no objection to fixing a limit. I think myself that the troubles we have had have grown out of overexpansion of credit. But I never would fix it as high as 1 to 7, because it would be greatly in excess of what is shown to be safe banking by the experience of the world. I do not, perhaps, think it is necessary; certainly not necessary in this bill. As I have already stated on several occasions, this bill does not pretend to be a panacea for all financial ills, and we certainly can not at this time undertake to dispose of them all. I think a limitation of loans in proportion to capital is a wise one, but I certainly would not fix the limit at 1 to 7.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand, then, the Senator would fix it at 1 to 5?

Mr. ALDRICH. I would not say. I would not want to say offhand what the proportion should be. I have stated the fact that there has been a growth in this country from 1 to 2.61 to 1 to 5.21—double in twenty years.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The only difference between the Senator and myself is that he would require greater caution in this particular than I suggest. I quite agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that the relation ought to be about 1 to 5. I stated 1 to 7 in order to liberalize the suggestion in order to prevent any possible objection.

Now, let me state to the Senator, as he well knows, there is no requirement in the national banking act that the capital shall bear any fixed relation to the loans, nor is there, I believe, in the State banking acts, and the result is that we have such conditions as these: That the Knickerbocker Trust Company, of New York, with a capital of only $1,000,000, was able to make loans to the amount of $50,000,000. So the proportion of capital to loans was not that of 1 to 5, as the Senator from Rhode Island suggests, but was the relation of 1 to 50.

Now, when that was called to my attention it was accompanied with the suggestion that it was simply a State bank. I then looked to the national banking act to see whether there was any provision there that would prevent such reckless banking, and I found there was none; that while the depositor is partly protected by requiring the bank to keep a certain proportion of the deposits in its vaults in order to respond to checks, there is no provision at all as to the amount of invested capital that shall be maintained as security for those deposits. And it is perfectly possible under the national banking act to-day to have a bank conducting a business of the enormous proportions of the Knickerbocker Trust Company, involving fifty millions of deposits and $50,000,000 of loans, upon a capital of only $1,000,000. Safe banking requires that depositors should have two sources of protection, one the protection of an ample reserve, the other the protection of an ample capital. The least reserve required should be an average of 20 per cent. The least proportion of capital should be 20 per cent also. Then you have safe banking, because the depositors of the bank have not only the security of the loans in which their moneys are invested, but they also have in addition the 20 per cent reserve in cash in the bank and the 20 per cent in capital put in by the stockholders and invested in marketable securities.

The best mode of securing depositors is not by a guaranty fund contributed by the banks or by a guaranty of the Government, but by providing for a sufficient reserve and sufficient capital. If we have in reserve and in capital a security of 40 per cent of the deposits, we will have a safe banking system.

REGULATION OF STATE BANKS.

Now, Mr. President, while I am upon this subject, I wish to add that it is utterly impossible to have a safe banking system in this country as long as we have two systems differing as to the security offered to their depositors. We have in this country two systems, the national-bank system and the State-bank system, both about equal in capitalization, both about equal in deposits; and yet under State banking laws there are not sufficient requirements as to reserves and there are not sufficient requirements as to capital. So at any time, however you may guard the national banks by proper provisions regarding reserve and capital and their relation to deposits and loans, the entire system may be broken down by inadequate reserves and inadequate capital upon the part of the State banks. We all know that if the State banking system of the country is involved in difficulty it involves the national banking system also, and that you can not possibly inaugurate a system that will successfully work in preventing panics if it is confined to one kind of banks alone.

If that be so, it seems to me that the very next reform which should suggest itself to the Senator from Rhode Island is the reform of securing under the State banking system sufficient reserves and sufficient capital such as we aim to require under the national banking system. That can be done in one of two ways, by persuasion or by compulsion, the latter being based on the power given to Congress to regulate commerce between the States, for all State banks are engaged in interstate exchange, which is one of the forms of interstate commerce. The Senator from Rhode Island asked me the other day while I was addressing myself to this question whether a check sent by a man in one State to a man in another State constituted interstate commerce. I was then endeavoring to put an hour's speech through a half hour nozzle, as I had to take the train, and I declined to enter into that question. But I find that the Wall Street Journal has answered it for me, and I will ask the Secretary to read this excerpt from the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that authority from that source is not of much value here in the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. However, it may be persuasive with the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. FLINT. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that it might have great weight on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

REVIEW AND OUTLOOK—WHAT IS INTERSTATE COMMERCE?

In the Senate, on Tuesday, Senator ALDRICH asked the following question of Senator NEWLANDS:

"In case a business house in New York sends a check to a firm in Connecticut, does that constitute interstate commerce?"

Senator NEWLANDS did not answer the question.

Innocent and simple as it appears, it is, in fact, a very big question, and it strikes at the very vitals of the whole problem of Federal regulation.

The answer to Senator ALDRICH'S question from the point of view of the Wall Street Journal would have to be "Yes." The sending of a check from one State to another involves the transfer of a valuable thing from one State to another. It is interstate commerce. Whether we like it or not, the development of business in the United States is revolutionizing all of our conceptions and changing most of our points of view. Commerce is no longer an affair of a township or a city or of a State. The economic unit has become a continent. The mailing of a letter, the sending of a telegram, and the holding of a telephone conversation between New York and Chicago, and almost all of the operations of business, have become interstate in character.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, whilst the reliability of this authority seems to be questioned, the logic of its statement can not be. Is there a Senator on this floor who will rise and say that the transaction by which goods are transported from the State of California to the State of New York is not interstate commerce? If that be true, is it not also true that the transaction by which the payment of those goods in money is transported from New York to California is interstate commerce? Is there a Senator on this floor who will rise and insist that a telegraphic message sent from one State to another is not interstate commerce?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That question has been specifically decided by the Supreme Court. Of course it is interstate commerce, and was so decided several times since the Pensacola case.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course it is incontestable. Is there a Senator on this floor who will rise and say that a whisper through a telephone from New York to Chicago is not interstate commerce? If that be true, how can you deny that the transactions of commerce conducted through banks, the great agencies and instrumentalities of commerce, and involving interstate and foreign exchange, do not come within the supervision and the control of the National Government?

I am aware that whenever a suggestion is made of the application of the interstate-commerce power of the Constitution to an existing condition the cry of centralization is raised. If it involves control, if it involves restriction, if it involves requirements, Senators on that side of the House accustomed to invoke the power regarding interstate and foreign commerce in the subsidizing of railroads, in the subsidizing of ships, in every form of grant or privilege or subsidy, will oppose it because it involves restriction, while on this side of the House Senators have been so accustomed to stand on guard against usurpation of States rights and powers by the National Government that although they wish to institute reforms, they question the national right and our power.

There can be no question about our power. We have exercised it again and again. We take hold of a State railroad engaged in interstate commerce with not a mile of its line in any State except the State in which it is incorporated, and yet receiving goods for shipment to other States, and what do we do with that railroad, by the vote of both sides of the Senate, by a recent vote in which there was but one dissenting voice? We take hold of that railroad and we compel it to present to the Interstate Commerce Commission of the nation reports of all its transactions, State as well as interstate. We not only regulate its rates, so far as interstate commerce is concerned, but we regulate its conduct of business. We compel it to apply safety appliances to its trains and everywhere we exercise supervision and regulation, not exclusive supervision and regulation, but supervision and regulation in the interest of interstate commerce.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that the Congress of the United States can fix a rate of interest to be paid by loans in State banks?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, that is a question that I would not like to answer in a moment. It certainly would have no power to fix the rate of interest as to a purely State transaction. I will admit that. But I am not prepared to answer the question as to whether it would have the power to regulate the rate of interest so far as interstate transactions are concerned. When I contend for this power of the National Government I do not contend that it is exclusive power. The National Government has the same power in its jurisdiction over interstate commerce that the State has over State commerce, and where the corporation is engaged in both State and interstate commerce it is subject to the supervision and control of the State so far as State commerce is concerned, and to the control and supervision of the nation so far as interstate commerce is concerned. The jurisdictions do not conflict, and each sovereign is supreme within the limits of its jurisdiction.

Now, what is this whole system of exchange? It is simply a system of transportation, a transportation of values. The railroads transport the goods; the banks transport the values. Both are absolutely essential to commerce; both are absolutely essential to interstate commerce. It is important to interstate commerce that we should have the safe conduct of passengers on the railroads, and therefore safety appliances are required of State railroads by national law. It is important to interstate commerce that State banks engaged in interstate transactions should have the safety appliances of a sufficient reserve and an ample capital, and it is the duty of the nation to see that these safety appliances are required.

So far as interstate commerce is concerned, the nation has all the power that the State has in State commerce.

Now, Mr. President, why should we stick in the bark when we are considering this question of the banks and of currency, this important system of transporting values, this system upon which all values in the country are dependent, the breaking down of which may at any time prostrate the industries of the country? Why should we not, when revising our system of banking, require in the interest of interstate commerce that the State banks engaged in interstate commerce should maintain as a condition of the exercise of that privilege the same reserves and the same capital as are required under similar circumstances of national banks?

PERSUASION.

But if the Senator from Rhode Island is not prepared to admit this proposition, if he insists that it is not within the power of the National Government, if he insists that it is a matter absolutely within the jurisdiction of States so far as State corporations are concerned, and that the nation's action must be confined to the corporations of its own creation, then I ask him why he should not apply all the powers of persuasion to the State banks that can be applied?

The Senator is now proposing a measure that is intended to meet the emergency requirements of the country; that is intended to prevent these extraordinary bank panics created by the timidity of depositors. The depositors of State banks can be as timid as the depositors in national banks, and they are as timid. If we are to provide an emergency measure that is to tide over a panic, there is every reason why we should give the State banks the benefit of the emergency provision. The very purpose that we have in view is the security of the country, the security of our entire banking system, national and State, and we must know that if the State banks of the country, which aggregate about one-half of the bank capital and more than one-half of the deposits of the country, are prostrated, our national banks will be prostrated with them.

If, then, we are providing for an emergency currency the State banks should have the benefit of it upon depositing the security required by law. And we can accompany the privilege with the condition that the State banks desiring its benefit shall receive it upon the condition that they will comply with the requirements of the national banking act so far as reserves and capital are concerned.

So the nation would have a persuasive influence upon the banks of the States in gradually making them conform to national requirements in the interest and for the security of the depositors, and all doing business with it in State or interstate transactions. There is not a State bank that would not realize that at some time it would be compelled to resort to the nation for the funds with which to meet an emergency of this kind, and it would be eager to put itself on the list of those who could lawfully apply. So these State banks would gradually accommodate their reserves and their capital to the requirements of the national law.

More than that, our action would be persuasive upon the legislatures of the States themselves. They would probably pass similar laws. Thus the educational process would be set at work, and in the end we would have uniformity throughout the country in all the banks of the country, both as to the reserves and the capital required.

Mr. President, I realize that all this can not be done in a day. We can enact in a day the law by which it is to be accomplished, but the process provided by the law must be a gradual one. What is that process to be? It would not do to provide that these reserves should be required to-morrow or that this capital should be increased to-morrow. Time must be given. The State banks during the past year have had an average reserve of less than 8 per cent. In many of the State banks the reserve is far above that average, and many of them far below.

What would you think of a national-bank system if you realized, upon looking at the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, that all the national banks of the country had an average of only 8 per cent?

To-day the national banks have an average reserve of 18 per cent, though it is unequally distributed, and the State banks have an average of less than 8 per cent. Yet if you should attempt to compel the State banks to come up immediately to the requirements of the national banks it would mean upon their part an immediate contraction of their loans, which would result in liquidation and universal distress.

The thing that we must do is to provide a gradual process for increasing the reserves of the State banks, lasting over a period of five or ten years, at the rate of a certain percentage annually, the increase to be accomplished under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency. In that way they can gradually draw into their vaults the lawful money required for the reserves established by the national law, and thus they will be able to sustain their existing volume of bank loans and bank credits.

In this manner the business of the country will not be disturbed in the slightest degree. So far as bank capital is concerned, that can be increased in the same gradual manner, and within a period of five or ten years we will have all the banks of the country, State and national, under laws providing adequate protection to depositors, both in reserves and capital. I trust that the Finance Committee will seriously consider this suggestion, and that now, whilst the subject is fresh in our minds, reforms in our banking system, admittedly necessary, will be added to this emergency provision recommended by the committee.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15653) to increase the pension of widows, minor children, and so forth, of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, and so forth, and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out section 1 in the following words:

That from and after the passage of this act the rate of pension for widows, minor children under the age of 16 years, and helpless minors as defined by existing laws, now on the roll or hereafter to be placed on the pension roll, and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $12 per month; and nothing herein shall be construed to affect the existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of 16 years and for each helpless child; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That from and after the passage and approval of this act the rate of pension for the widow of any officer or enlisted man who served in any Indian war, the war with Mexico, or the civil war, whose name is now on the pension roll or hereafter shall be placed on the pension roll under any existing law, and who is receiving or is entitled under said law to receive a pension at a rate of less than $12 per month, shall be increased to and allowed at $12 per month, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 24, before the word "application," to insert "filing of her;" on page 3, line 2, after the word "to," to strike out "June 27, 1890," and insert "the passage and approval of this act;" on page 3, line 4, after the word "husbands," to strike out "are given" and insert "if living would have;" on page 3, line 6, after the word "the," to strike out "act" and insert "joint resolutions," and, in line 7, after the word "ninety-five," to strike out "and the joint resolutions of;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That if any officer or enlisted man who served ninety days or more in the Army or Navy of the United States during the late civil war and who has been honorably discharged therefrom has died or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood: Provided, That said widow shall have married said soldier or sailor prior to the passage and approval of this act; and the benefits of this section shall include those widows whose husbands if living would have a pensionable status under the joint resolutions of February 15, 1895, July 1, 1902, and June 28, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to submit another committee amendment to come in after line 9, on page 3, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 9, after the word "six," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of 16 years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to increase the pension of widows of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war."

PROBATE COURT FEES AND COSTS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3507) to fix fees and costs in the probate court of the District of Columbia, and to provide for the collection and payment of the same, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, page 8, line 24, after the word "section," it is proposed to strike out "four" and to insert "IV."

Mr. GAMBLE. That amendment is an error, Mr. President. The figures "111" should be inserted instead of the Roman numerals "IV," and I move that amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota to the committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, page 8, line 24, it is proposed to strike out "four" and to insert "111," so as to read:

But shall be entitled to the fees allowed by section 111 of the Code, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GAMBLE. In lieu of the committee amendments, the same amendment should be made in section 8, page 9, in lines 10 and 14, and I move that amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 9, line 10, before the word "of," it is proposed to strike out "4" and to insert "111;" and in line 14, before the words "of the," to strike out "4" and to insert "111."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, on page 8, line 24, after the word "Code," it is proposed to insert "of Law for the District of Columbia," so as to read:

The Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, on page 9, line 14, after the words "of the," to insert "said;" and in the same line, after the word "Code," to strike out "of Law for the District of Columbia," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the court may allow to the register of wills reasonable fees for any services he may perform not specified in said section 111 of the said code.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, on page 11, line 24, before the word "is," to insert "of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia," so as to read:

SEC. 14. That section 121 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended so as to read as follows, etc.:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 5, after the word "probate," to strike out "of" and insert "and approve;" in line 7, after the word "him," to strike out "and pass any claims not exceeding $500;" and in line 9, after the word "guardians," to strike out "provided that should the said register of wills refuse to approve any bond, any party in interest shall have the right to appeal to the presiding justice of the probate court who shall either approve or reject the bond," so as to read:

The said register of wills may receive inventories and accounts of sales, examine vouchers, and state accounts of executors, administrators, collectors, and guardians, subject to final passage or rejection of same by the court, may take probate and approve claims against the estates of deceased persons that are proper to be brought before him; may take the probate of wills and accept and approve the bonds of executors, administrators, collectors, and guardians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 11, after the word "wills," to strike out "act of June 30, 1902," so as to read:

And provided further, That the employees of said office shall not be in excess of the number actually necessary for the proper conduct of the office of said register of wills.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 15, on page 13, line 14, before the word "is," to insert "of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia," so as to read:

SEC. 15. That section 264 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended so as to read as follows, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 21, before the word "register," to strike out "court or," so as to read:

SEC. 264. Executor residuary legatee.—If the executor is the residuary legatee of the personal estate of the testator, or provided the residuary legatee of full age shall notify his consent to the court, he may, instead of the bond prescribed as aforesaid, give bond with security approved by the register of wills, and in a penalty prescribed by the court, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 16, page 14, line 14, before the word "is," to insert "of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia," so as to read:

SEC. 16. That section 275 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended so as to read as follows, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 20, before the word "register," to strike out "court or," so as to read:

SEC. 275. Special bond.—If the person appointed as administrator shall be entitled to the residue of the estate after the payment of the debts, he may, instead of the bond herein provided for, execute a bond, with security approved by the register of wills, in such penalty as the court may consider sufficient, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 17, as follows:

SEC. 17. That all laws and parts of laws, so far as they may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 14, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 17. That no account shall be approved unless the executor, administrator, or collector, his agent, or solicitor, or attorney shall file an affidavit showing that, at least twenty days before presenting such account for approval, he duly addressed and mailed, postpaid, a notice of such application to each legatee or distribute to their known post-office address notifying each of them of the amounts claimed for commission and attorney's fees.

Mr. GAMBLE. In line 20 of the amendment, after the word "or," I move to strike out "distribute" and insert "distributee."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 15, after line 22, to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 18. That all laws and parts of laws, so far as they may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAMBLE. In section 2, page 1, line 11, after the word "due," I move to insert the words "to and from the."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 1, line 11, after the word "due," it is proposed to insert "to and from the," so as to read:

The inventory of money and debts due to and from the deceased.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire from what committee this bill comes

Mr. GAMBLE. It is reported unanimously from the Committee on the District of Columbia. The bill was submitted to a subcommittee and very carefully investigated. Both the subcommittee and the full committee had before them the register of wills and the judge of the probate court—Judge Gould.

Mr. STONE. Does the bill increase the fees now received for the same service?

Mr. GAMBLE. It more equally distributes the fees, and the fees will be paid more equitably, especially by the larger estates.

Mr. STONE. Will it increase the cost of administering an estate?

Mr. GAMBLE. It will to this extent——

Mr. GALLINGER. To a very small amount.

Mr. GAMBLE. To a very small amount. As the law now exists, the largest part of the burden falls upon the smaller estates; and this is to more equitably distribute the cost of administration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GAMBLE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. As an illustration, an estate in this District amounting to $862.51 pays $44.14, while an estate of $1,673,820 pays $141. There is an absolutely inequitable condition existing here, and this bill proposes to equalize it more scientifically. It increases the cost a mere trifle.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2326) to provide for the purchase of a site for the erection of a customs-house and Federal court building thereon at Wilmington, N. C.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 1, line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "four," and at the end of the bill to add the following:

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States Treasury as a customs-house and for the use of the Federal court in the city of Wilmington, in the State of North Carolina, at a limit of cost not to exceed $400,000.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITION TO ROCK CREEK PARK.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4441) to acquire certain land in the District of Columbia as an addition to Rock Creek Park.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill how much appropriation it carries?

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator ask what this will cost?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is the effect of the inquiry.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that this is a tract of land abutting on Massachusetts avenue extended. It contains nearly 100 acres, and my impression is, without having the figures directly before me now, that the cost will be between three and four hundred thousand dollars. The bill was carefully considered last year and passed the Senate. Afterwards it was a part of a recommendation made by the commission that was appointed by the two Houses to examine the question of parks. That commission carefully looked into this matter and made a favorable recommendation. I have never heard anybody seriously object to it, notwithstanding it will cost quite a bit of money. It is a very desirable thing to be done. It completes the park and brings it out to Massachusetts avenue, where it ought to be. It is very heavily wooded, and the belief is that the cost is very low in comparison with the cost of other property in that vicinity.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state that I am on the Committee on the District of Columbia, and, so far as I have any recollection, the bill was not considered while I was present in committee. It is a very important matter, and though I do not insist that it go to the Calendar under Rule IX, I object to its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the bill goes over I want to correct a statement I made to the Senator, so that he may have accurate information. The proposed cost I said was between three and four hundred thousand dollars. The bill names the price as $423,000. The bill last year was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. This year it has been reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the park bills having this year been referred to that committee.

ISSUANCE OF PATENTS.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17703) to repeal section 4885 of the Revised Statutes and to substitute another section therefor, to report it without amendment. I ask that it be substituted for Senate bill 3972, being Calendar No. 312. I also ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah reports from the Committee on Patents the bill named by him, and asks that it be substituted on the Calendar for the bill (S. 3972) to amend section 4885 of the Revised Statutes. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered, and the Senate bill referred to is indefinitely postponed.

The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just presented by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17703) to repeal section 4885 of the Revised Statutes and to substitute another section therefor.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, that appears to be a very clumsy form of changing a section of the Revised Statutes. I think the bill ought to read:

That section 4885 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows.

I do not think we ought to put legislation in the form this appears to be from the reading of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that is a House bill.

Mr. NELSON. It proposes to repeal the original section and then reenacts another one to take the place of it. I think the proper way would be to say that the section proposed to be repealed "is hereby amended so as to read as follows." That is the customary way, and I move that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the word "is," it is proposed to strike out "repealed and the following section is substituted therefor" and insert "amended so as to read as follows," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4885 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4885. Every patent shall issue within a period of three months from the date of the payment of the final fee, which fee shall be paid not later than six months from the time at which the application was passed and allowed and notice thereof was sent to the applicant or his agent; and if the final fee is not paid within that period the patent shall be withheld."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 4885 of the Revised Statutes."

HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN ON HUNTLEY IRRIGATION PROJECT, MONTANA.

Mr. DIXON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14043) to provide for the extension of time within which homestead entrymen may establish their residence upon certain lands within the limits of the Huntley irrigation project, in the county of Yellowstone, in the State of Montana.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DIXON. It proposes that the homestead entrymen on lands within the limits of the Huntley irrigation project, in the county of Yellowstone, in the State of Montana, opened to entry July 22, 1907, be granted an extension of time in which to establish their residence upon the lands so opened and filed upon until the 15th of May, 1908; but this act shall in no manner affect the regularity or validity of such filings, or any of them, so made by the entrymen on the lands aforesaid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TIDE WATER BRIDGE AT EDGECOMB, ME.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16073) to authorize the town of Edgecomb, Lincoln County, Me., to maintain a free bridge across tide waters.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN P. HUNTER.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2015) for the relief of John P. Hunter.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John P. Hunter, late United States marshal for the district of South Carolina, $308.13, which sum to be taken and accepted and receipted for in full satisfaction of his claim for services performed by his deputy, H. J. Hickson, in the case of the United States against J. T. Tillman.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I want to give notice that on Monday next, immediately after the routine morning business, I will submit some remarks on the Aldrich currency bill. I want to say further that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] gave a similar notice this morning in behalf of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I have been in communication with the Senator from Wisconsin, who is now in bed, and it is with his consent that I am to take his place on Monday. I give notice that he will speak on Tuesday immediately after the routine morning business.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16749) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania, by the Liberty Bridge Company," approved March 2, 1907.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania, by the Liberty Bridge Company," approved March 2, 1907, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from March 15, 1908.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 12, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 11, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 138. An act to provide for the survey of the public lands of the States of Idaho, Oregon, Montana, and California;

S. 6047. An act repealing section 13 of the act approved March 2, 1907, entitled "An act amending an act entitled 'An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes,' and for other purposes;"

S. 4793. An act authorizing settlers on Crow Reservation lands in Montana to mortgage same for the construction of irrigation systems prior to final proof;

S. 3970. An act to revise and amend the statutes relating to patents;

S. R. 9. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a condemned cannon to the board of regents of the University of South Dakota, at Vermilion, S. Dak., to be placed on the campus of said institution; and

S. R. 6. Joint resolution directing the selection of a site and the erection of a pedestal for a bronze statue in Washington, D. C., in honor of John Witherspoon.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 16860. An act to establish a United States land district in the Territory of New Mexico, to be known as the Tucumcari land district; and

H. R. 9205. An act to make the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1891 (26 Stats., p. 796) applicable to the Territory of New Mexico.

The message also announced that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. BAILEY and Mr. GALLINGER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Interior Department.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 138. An act to provide for the survey of the public lands of the States of Idaho, Oregon, Montana, and California—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 6047. An act repealing section 13 of the act approved March 2, 1907, entitled "An act amending an act entitled 'An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes,' and for other purposes"—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 4793. An act authorizing settlers on Crow Reservation lands in Montana to mortgage same for the construction of irrigation systems prior to final proof—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 3970. An act to revise and amend the statutes relating to patents—to the Committee on Patents.

S. R. 9. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a condemned cannon to the board of regents of the University of South Dakota, at Vermilion, S. Dak., to be placed on the campus of said institution—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. R. 6. Joint resolution directing the selection of a site and the erection of a pedestal for a bronze statue in Washington, D. C., in honor of John Witherspoon—to the Committee on the Library.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18347, the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 430, at $700 each; 225, at $600 each; and 100, at $500 each; in all, $486,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, lines 1 and 2, strike out "430" and insert "530."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I also offer the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, lines 4 and 5, strike out "four hundred and eighty-six thousand" and insert "five hundred and fifty-six thousand."

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana what is the pay provided in this bill for the watchmen and laborers in the post-offices?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There are 530 watchmen, messengers, and laborers at $700 each, 225 at $600 each, and 100 at $500 each.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say last year that the pay of watchmen was $720 a year.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; we have taken the watchmen, messengers, and laborers at the salaries they are now receiving and incorporated them in this item of appropriation, except that there were a few laborers at $400, who were covered into the $500 class.

Mr. MANN. I remember that last year the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] offered an amendment for the purpose of increasing the salaries of watchmen to $800 a year, and the gentleman in charge of the bill, properly I think, although it was against my desire, raised the point of order on it and stated that the salary then provided was $720.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The current law provides no $720 compensation for employees in the post-office. It is $700; not $720.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman's committee considered the desirability or the necessity of increasing the salaries of watchmen and laborers in the large cities?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It has not been limited to the consideration of salaries in the large cities; but the committee considered, in a limited way, the problem of increases of salaries of all kinds, including those of laborers and watchmen, and determined that it would not make any recommendation for increases of salaries of any class this year.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, that amendment was simply to correct an error in the preparation of the bill.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if the bill does not decrease the number of laborers by fifty or sixty from last year.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No. If the gentleman has noticed, the first amendment I offered increased the number in this item 100. That was a clerical error in the preparation of the bill, and is now corrected by these two amendments.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I was not here when the first amendment was adopted, and, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have some remarks and a diagram upon the Appalachian Forest Reserve which I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the proposal to print a diagram in the RECORD would have to be submitted to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I withdraw that part of my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. I here submit the following letter as a part of my remarks:

COLUMBUS, GA., March 2, 1908.

Judge ADAMSON, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE: I inclose diagram of Pine Mountain, which was made from United States Geological Survey, Talbotton and Opelika quadrangles. That part of it inclosed with red lines is the strictly mountainous part and consists of 12,000 acres. I have extended this by cross marks, which space within the cross marks, excluding the red-line areas, both north and south of the mountain, would make the whole area about 36,000 acres. These 24,000 acres, exclusive of the strictly mountainous part, 12,000 acres, are just as proper to be included as the strictly mountainous portion. I do not believe that the 24,000 acres contain exceeding 10 per cent of land that would be fit for agricultural purposes. Now, the object is to get this tacked onto the Appalachian forestry bill, now pending in Congress. You know that below the points where Mountain Oak and Mulberry creeks empty into the Chattahoochee River, the largest water powers on the river down to Columbus exist. This Pine Mountain reservation can be made equal to any other part of the Appalachian range for forestry preservation; between Hamilton and Mountain Hill, as the United States Geological Survey shows, on the south side of the mountain, enough water can be had at Columbus by gravity for municipal purposes for 400,000 or 500,000 people. Mulberry and Mountain Oak creeks are notoriously muddy creeks in times of high water or freshets. They used to be comparatively clear streams.

The amounts of detritus that these creeks are contributing to the river, filling up the dams and making it more difficult to keep the navigation of the river below Columbus open, are prodigious. If, in all respects, the Appalachian range in North Georgia is eligible for forestry reservation, this lowest portion of the same range of mountains is equally so, and the bill should be amended so as to include these Pine Mountain areas. I have written Mr. Pinchot to see you on the subject. Mr. Mills, who lectured here on forestry preservation, a short while ago, and myself had a conversation about the Pine Mountain area, and after my explanation he thought it should be included. I do not know what disposition will be made with the forestry bill at this or future sessions of Congress; but when the bill is likely to pass the Pine Mountain area should be already incorporated. In those respects explained by the President in his recent message on waterways, it has all of the conditions for forestry restoration, for water for municipal purposes, for increasing and steadying a supply of water for water power, and for the navigation of the Chattahoochee River below Columbus.

I trust that you will see that it is incorporated in the bill, and I am sure that it will present the closest feature of the relation of the Pine Mountain to the lower waters of the Chattahoochee in the very particulars that sustain the argument favorable to forestry preservation, etc.

Although the national forestry bill may not be acted on at this session of Congress, there is no doubt eventually it will be passed. This bill includes the Appalachian range, in which the Chattahoochee River has its source. Pine Mountain is the most southern extension of the Appalachian Mountains, and in every argument that has been made for forest preservation Pine Mountain range, traversing Harris County, with Mountain Oak Creek to the north of it and Mulberry Creek to the south, emptying into the Chattahoochee River 15 and 16 miles north of Columbus, is the fittest forestry area in the South for such preservation.

As shown by a tracing from the United States geological surveys of the Talbotton and Opelika quadrangles, those which are strictly the mountain sources of drainage into Mountain Oak and Mulberry creeks, consist of 12,000 acres. Adding to this the lower formations of the mountains, the areas would be about 36,000 acres, of which not more than 10 per cent are fit for agricultural purposes. These mountains have in times past been covered with long-leaf pines and every variety of southern timber growth. Injudicious cutting and fires have already destroyed most of this timber. If it was restored and so much of it disposed of annually by the Government for wood and lumber it is almost safe to say that it would supply the Fourth Congressional District with lumber as long as its political existence lasted. The terms proposed in the creation of national forests are to purchase the lands at not more than $5 or $6 per acre.

The majority of the great water powers on the Chattahoochee are below where Oak Mountain and Mulberry creeks empty into the river. The United States Geological Survey shows that between Hamilton and Mountain Hill there is a plentiful supply of water by gravity for 500,000 people at Columbus.

California, which has one-half of our annual rainfall, has proved that water supply has increased 25 per cent after forest restoration. It is safe to assert that ours would increase 50 per cent.

It cost Switzerland $35 per acre to restore her forests, and Italy $20 per acre. Of all the Appalachian system to be preserved, Pine Mountain is the most important in proportion. The pine growth of Pine Mountain is most prolific of turpentine. The turpentine of the South has been obtained by cutting a hole in one side of the tree, called "boxing," which in a few years kills the tree. The Forest Service has found a method of extracting turpentine by which the trees are far less injured and the yield is increased 30 per cent.

We in Columbus are thoroughly alive to this question, and I trust that you will become enlisted in the cause, seeing that your district is directly to be benefited, and that you will also secure the cooperation of the Congressmen from Florida and Alabama whose districts border the lower Chattahoochee.

It occurs to me that our opponents will have a difficult task to show that the Government has not the right to make these purchases. The closeness of Pine Mountain to the Chattahoochee River strengthens the point that the United States has power to make the purchase, in reference to their jurisdiction over navigable streams and for their protection.

I am further inclined to think that the constitutional right of the Government to acquire territory either "by conquest or treaty" can be used as an additional liberal argument in favor of Congress to acquire these mountain areas for forestry preservation, etc.

I am, yours, very truly,

CHARLES J. SWIFT.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks in charge of contract stations, at a rate of compensation above $300 each, and not to exceed $1,000 each, $250,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to move to increase the amount. This is a matter that affects the so-called "substations," or numbered stations. The present law and the bill both carry the distinction between salaries above $300 and salaries of $300 and below. I understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], in charge of the bill, the other day to say that in the estimates and suggestions made by the Department these provisions were lumped in some way, and it was not very clearly stated how the dividing line should be made.

For some years the Department has endeavored to arrive at some basis upon which to fix the salaries for those stations. They have changed it from time to time. It originally was based on the amount of stamps sold, the amount of business transacted in that way, but it was thought that some of the clerks in charge of substations padded their stamp sales by encouraging the sale of stamps to people in large quantities, and so that method was changed. Several years ago they arrived at a basis which fixed the salary by the amount of money orders and registered letters, and started in with a basis of $100 for a thousand dollars of business in money orders and registered letters, and a salary of $200 for a business of $2,000, and between two and three thousand dollars a salary of $300. That basis has since been changed so that the salaries are reduced somewhat. It takes a larger number of money orders and registered-letter transactions to increase the salary from $100 to $200, the initial salary being $100. But while the Department has fixed their schedule of the amount of transactions upon which to base the salaries, they have not been able to keep faith because the amount appropriated was not sufficient.

For instance, in my own district, for the year 1906, station 16 received a salary of $500, and the combined money-order and registered-letter transactions were 4,758. Last year the number of transactions increased to 5,105, and the salary was reduced to $400.

On station 23 the combined transactions for 1906—and these are for the year ending March 31 of the year named—were 3,180, and the salary $400. Last year the combined transactions were 3,229, and the salary was reduced to $300 instead of being increased.

On station 46 the combined transactions were 1,529 and the salary was $200. But last year, while the transactions had increased to 2,972, the salary was reduced to $100. Of course, that is not in the class above $300.

On station 81 the combined money-order transactions and registered letters was 6,643 and the salary was $600. I may say that is a large amount of business transacted. Last year the combined money order and registered letters at this station was 8,354, and the salary was reduced, although the amount of business had increased from 6,643 to 8,354. The salary was enough to entitle him to a raise of salary under their schedules and entitle him to a raise of salary on the amount of business transacted, but the salary, instead of being increased, was reduced.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, right there I would like to ask my friend if it is not a fact that the schedule was changed to a different basis for compensation of these clerks by the Post-Office Department?

Mr. MANN. I have just stated that the basis had been changed, but not last year. And even upon the change of basis, even upon the basis now in force, these people are entitled to an increase in salary, but there is not sufficient appropriation. Even upon the basis which the Department endeavors to enforce there is not sufficient appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply to the gentleman's criticism, I wish to say that he is quite correct in his statement as to the schedules that have been in force in prior years for the fees to the clerks in charge of these contract stations, but I wish to direct his attention to what I believe has been the difficulty which has caused the Department not to grant all of the increases according to the schedule of business in force in the Department. In prior years these two items providing for clerks in charge of contract stations have been carried just previous to the item which carries the lump-sum appropriation for the entire clerical service in the post-offices of the country. Although in those two items for clerks in charge of contract stations we provided a definite appropriation for each of the two classes, still the total amount was embodied in the gross appropriation for clerical hire.

The Department during the last two years has inadvertently furnished erroneous estimates as to the total amount necessary in this appropriation, not only of clerks because of increase of business, but during the present fiscal year because of increases in salary for promotion purposes, so that the Department has been forced to limit the expenditure out of these two respective items and has used that money for expenditures for clerical purposes. Last year noticeably that was the case, and I have the figures here if the gentleman would wish to have them. There was at the time the bill was under consideration last year a balance of more than $35,000 apparently available for expenditure in these two items, but that amount had been utilized for expenditure for clerical purposes other than for clerks in charge of contract stations, and to-day in this very item we are considering we appropriate in the current bill, for these contract stations of the $300 grade and under, the sum of $515,000. On January 16 of this year, according to the statement furnished the committee under date of January 22, there was being expended the annual rate of $498,873, making available more than $15,000 for the remainder of the present fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. But we are talking about an item above three hundred. I do not want the gentleman to get the committee to think that there is a large amount of money here——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I wish to save the time of the House by considering both items at one time, because I believe I can convince the gentleman that the difficulty has been in the arrangement of these items, rather than the amount appropriated, and it has not been the fault of the committee in making inadequate appropriations for this service.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, if the gentleman proposes to convince me by showing me that the Post-Office Department has violated the law and used this fund for something else, then I want the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER], the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, to pay particular attention to it, because, if that is the case, I want him to make it hot for somebody in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question but that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would make it very warm for somebody in the Post-Office Department if there has been any violation of the law, but I hardly believe my statement will warrant any such construction.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that a part of this fund had been diverted from contract stations, and the appropriation expressly says "for clerks in charge of contract stations."

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been diverted, yet under the decision of the Comptroller it was permissible, and the discretion rested with the Department heads to use this money for any of the items carried in the previous sections, which was included in the total appropriation. Now, what have we done this year? We have separated——

Mr. MANN. But that is a very important matter, to know whether——

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit me to make my explanation before he takes the floor again, I shall be very much obliged. This year we have sought to overcome that difficulty by segregating those two items and furnishing two distinct provisions, separate and apart from the total appropriation for clerical hire, and not including the amounts carried for those two items for clerks in charge of contract stations into the total amount provided for clerks and employees in first and second class post-offices.

Mr. MANN. What I want to get at is the fact in reference to the diversion of this money.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will see, if he looks at page 12, that these two items for clerks in charge of contract stations are separate and distinct, and follow the total appropriation, as found in lines 12 and 13, on page 11, while in the current law they immediately precede the total appropriation, which was provided for all character of clerks and employees in the postal service.

Now, by so segregating these items we thereby remove the discretion of the post-office officials to utilize this fund for any other purpose except as designated in the item, that of "clerks in charge of contract stations."

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman raised a question which goes away beyond the importance of contract stations. Does the gentleman mean to tell the House that the Comptroller rules that the different items which go to make up this $28,661,500, on page 11, are of no consequence and that the Post-Office Department can transfer the amounts appropriated as they please?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; but the gentleman does maintain that when we make a total appropriation, as we did last year, for all this character of service, carrying the amount of twenty-six millions——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman continue to yield to me?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Last year the amount appropriated in this item carried $26,390,200, which included that then carried for contract stations of $235,000 for those of $300 and under, and $515,000 for those above the $300 grade. That total appropriation of twenty-six millions and odd dollars was not the full amount that would have been computed if we had estimated for all the number of clerks at the respective salaries carried in the preceding items, because the committee does not grant the full amount of the annual rate of expenditure, because some of these clerks are put in the service at different times of the year and therefore the money is not needed at the beginning of the fiscal year, and the total estimate can be scaled down accordingly.

Mr. MANN. But has the Department the right to divert an appropriation included in that amount for a specific purpose and use it for some other purpose?

Mr. STAFFORD. But the Department has not diverted it. It has in no instance exceeded the allowance in the number of clerks that have been carried in the previous items. But the Department has the right, and there is nothing compulsory on the Department, to expend so much of the amount of money that is carried in any respective item as it determines.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. STAFFORD. When we provide for so many clerks and officials we do not say to the Department, "You must employ that number during the fiscal year." We naturally leave that to the discretion of the Department. Now, as far as these clerks in contract stations are concerned, we leave it to the discretion of the Department to place them where they believe the needs of the postal service demand; but the explanation of the inadequacy of appropriation is traceable to the fact that they have failed to give the committee a careful and correct estimate as to the total amount of appropriation necessary for the postal service so far as clerical service was concerned.

Mr. MANN. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, maybe I can get at the information. Last year we appropriated $235,000 for this item?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Contract stations above $300. Is that $235,000 now being used solely for the purpose of paying clerks in charge of contract stations?

Mr. STAFFORD. Some of it is and some may be used for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. That is what I wanted to know. By what authority is some of it being used for other purposes?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, because that $235,000 has been bulked in the total amount of $26,390,200, which provides for all this service, and the prior items did not carry sufficient appropriation to pay for what they believed was necessary during the fiscal year and more urgently needed for the postal service.

Mr. MANN. Then the segregation of that sum into items is idle?

Mr. STAFFORD. I grant you that it was not as forceful as the method adopted in this bill.

Mr. MANN. That is not the law; that is not the ruling of the Comptroller.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee this year, noting that there was that difficulty in the administration, has separated those items, so that it is no longer included in the total, but it is found now in two separate items, on page 12, whereby the Department can not use that money for any other purpose.

Mr. MANN. But I think the gentleman is mistaken in what the Department has done.

Mr. WANGER. That is already segregated.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The arrangement in the present bill now under consideration is a far better arrangement——

Mr. MANN. I am not complaining about that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Than contained in the prior bill. While under the former law, as it was possible to use part of the $175,000 for purposes other than the pay of contract station agents, it can not be used for any other purpose under the present bill.

Mr. MANN. How was it possible before? Do I understand the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to say that when we appropriate for so many clerks, and so forth, at $1,200 each, that that means nothing—that the Department can use that money to pay clerks drawing $1,300 salary?

Mr. OVERSTREET. But if in addition to the amount of money necessary to pay those clerks at those respective salaries you include a lump sum from which you may pay for contract stations, then that would leave a merged fund.

They had all the clerks given their respective salary during the year and it was all covered for contract stations. Now, the committee have further separated that, and made a still greater segregation of the fund, to the benefit, in our judgment, of the payment for contract stations.

Mr. MANN. Well, last year I asked the gentleman this same question, and moved to amend the appropriation by increasing it from $235,000 to $250,000. The gentleman from Indiana, in whom I have great confidence, informs me that the amount appropriated was sufficient for the service, and now it turns out that it is not sufficient.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think it was, and the gentleman has stated it was by giving the expenditures.

Mr. MANN. I think there is not a dollar that is unexpended.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have given the amount in this statement.

Mr. MANN. But I am not talking about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am directing the attention of Members to this fact. There has been an understanding by Members of the House here that there is no fund available for that character of station. I wish to say that on January 10, although we had appropriated $515,000 there had only been an expenditure at the annual rate of $498,873, leaving a balance available of more than $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he claim the floor in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Now, will the gentleman permit me? He persistently talks about a proposition not before the committee. I have asked in reference to a proposition which is before the committee, and that is, whether there is any surplus fund for this purpose now?

Mr. STAFFORD. As to the appropriation for the grades in excess of $300, there is no money at present available out of the fund appropriated.

Mr. MANN. That is what I was saying. The gentleman from Indiana corrected me, and said that it was available, upon the strength of the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin; and the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct, but it would give an erroneous impression in the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no money available so far as the item of appropriation for the grades above $300 are concerned; but there is money available for those below. We have increased the appropriation carried last year from the amount of $235,000 to the amount of $250,000.

Mr. MANN. Increased it by $15,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have increased it $15,000; and we have increased the other item still more, from $515,000 to $525,000; and taking the annual rate of expenditure at $498,000, or say $500,000 even, it leaves $25,000 additional that we have appropriated.

We have proceeded in this bill upon the recommendation of First Assistant Postmaster-General Hitchcock, made two years ago, that he believed that it was for the best interest of the service to have a larger number of these contract stations that received a small allowance, rather than too many of the higher grade, for he believed, and I believe with him, that it is better for the country and the service to have a greater number of small contract stations scattered about the city districts so as to be within easy reach of the patrons of the service, rather than to have a few large contract stations isolated and at a distance from their patrons. We have followed that recommendation by granting a heavier allowance, a heavier increase in the item of the $300 grade than in the higher grade. I want to inform the House that we have followed that recommendation, nevertheless making provision for increases which are necessary to provide for all the present service in the $400 grade and upward.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands that the Post-Office Department necessarily has some rules and regulations about the establishment of any station. Take a money-order and registry station amounting to more than $10,000 a year, and there are not many post-offices in the country that have as large money transactions. The salary is $600. The gentleman understands that money-order business at such stations, most of it, is foreign money orders. It is only by the greatest persuasion that it has been possible to persuade anybody to keep that place. Now, under the appropriation made in this bill it will not be possible to increase the salary according to the schedule made by the Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. We are providing $15,000 for the very limited number of offices of that character. There are only a few.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that there are a limited number. I think I have twenty or twenty-five such stations in my district.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now, it is absolutely impossible to maintain stations of this character. I have a letter in my hand from the postmaster at Chicago in which he says he has endeavored to locate a station there, but he had applied to the owner of drug stores in the locality, and as soon as they are fully informed as to the matter they declined it, and others who had formerly had them declined to keep the stations.

A few years ago I went to the Department and showed them a portion of my district that had a population of 10,000 people where you could not buy a postage stamp.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I should like to ask somebody—and I think the gentleman from Illinois can answer it—why these stations are opened right close to the central post-office, within a block or two, or very close by?

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman that that is not done in Chicago. I do not know how it is elsewhere.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It is done in many parts of the country.

Is it because druggists want to advertise in that way and attract people into their stores? If that is the purpose of it, they should not receive large compensation.

Mr. MANN. They do not get large compensation in any event.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. He has made a very remarkable statement to the gentleman from Illinois, and I should like some light on it. In several places in this bill, for the convenience of Members——

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I submit that we are entirely unable to hear the conversation that is taking place between the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say that in order to get into this discussion I had to come over on the Republican side.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will not the gentlemen take us into their confidence? Will not my colleague from New York come back here onto this side of the House, so that we can hear what he has to say?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I would not know anything about it if I were over there, and I want to see if I can find out anything.

Mr. MANN. We would not be unkind enough to say that that is the usual condition on that side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. There does not seem to be much hope, from the course of this discussion, that I will get the information I want.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has the floor. Does he yield to any gentleman; and if so, to whom?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. At several places in this bill, for the convenience of Members or the post-office officials or the public, items run along and are then totaled and a gross sum is stated as the amount appropriated for a certain service, which is divided into several items.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I again suggest that it is impossible to hear what is being said by gentlemen over on the other side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin wish to inform the House that there has been a ruling that the mere totaling of the amounts appropriated in certain items gives to the Department a discretion to use that sum indiscriminately for any of the purposes preceding it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not indiscriminately.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How discriminately?

Mr. COCKRAN. I again call the gentlemen to order. No one of us here has the slightest idea of what the gentleman from Wisconsin is saying to the gentleman from New York. Is there any way in which the House can obtain a knowledge of what is taking place?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to maintain order in the Chamber, but the Chair can not control the positions which gentlemen take when speaking.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to hear what the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] is saying. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the query propounded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], that they can not use that sum indiscriminately, because they are limited by the number of men provided and the appropriations provided in these respective items. Take, for example, any of the items prior to the stated total of appropriation found on page 11. For instance, the $900 grade. We provide 7,379 at not to exceed $900 each, and so on through the various classes. Now, we do not provide by appropriation for the total that each of the respective numbers of employees would carry if they all received that salary throughout the year, because, as I explained, in answer to a question from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], they are not all placed in the service at one time, and as to some the amount is not necessary for the full year, and consequently the full amount is not appropriated. Now, in closing——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not want the gentleman to close so quickly. In the law for the current year is an item, clerks in charge of contract stations, at a rate of compensation above $300 each, and not to exceed $1,000 each, $235,000. Has it been held that the Postmaster-General can expend, out of this total appropriation, more than $235,000 for that specific purpose?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not so understand it. He is not obliged to use all of the $235,000, which is included in the total amount of $26,390,200.

Mr. MANN. In other words, your total of $26,000,000 was insufficient?

Mr. STAFFORD. It was insufficient in the full totals——

Mr. MANN. Your guess last year was a little too low.

Mr. STAFFORD. The estimate of the Department for clerical services was too low.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Indiana was to allow reasonable debate.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is no amendment pending before the committee; it is merely matters of explanation, and it has been limited to two or three individuals, and I supposed they were about through.

Mr. MANN. I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I will make it ten minutes, Mr. Chairman; I move to close all debate in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments close in ten minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But there is no amendment.

Mr. MANN. I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on that side turn their backs to us, and no one can hear a word that is said.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to make a suggestion, it seems to me that we will make better progress if gentlemen will offer amendments and speak to them instead of making pro forma amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on the present amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "fifty," in line 8, page 12, and inserting the word "seventy-five."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, line 8, strike out the word "fifty" and insert "seventy-five," so that it will read "$275,000."

Mr. MANN. I wish the committee would accept this amendment. The Post-Office Department has its rules, and they can not increase anybody's salary above what the rule provides. It only takes care of the increase authorized under the regulations and can not be used as a fund in any way. The increase proposed this year is not sufficient.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The highest recommendation of the Department for all the service of contract stations embodied in both of these paragraphs aggregated $795,000, and when the official before the committee was asked the direct question how he would separate the increase of $45,000, which was the total of his recommendation, he said he would make it $270,000. Now the gentleman's amendment provides for $275,000.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to make it $270,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is the highest recommendation of a Department which is the most liberal in recommendations of any Department of my acquaintance in the service.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman must understand that the Department establishes no stations under this clause; the stations are all established under the other clause. The increase is simply for use in accordance with the regulations fixed by the Department, and it seems to me where the business increases, where the man is told that when he reaches a certain amount he will have an increase in the salary, the Department and the Government should keep faith with him. It can not increase the expenses of the Government except in accordance with the regulations and scale fixed by the Department. Is it not fair to these people, is it not for the interest of the service, to pay them the amount that they are told they will receive when the business reaches that point?

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will make it $265,000——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will modify my amendment, if I may, and make it $265,000 instead of $275,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 8, page 12, strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "sixty-five."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no objection to that amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have a letter in connection with this subject, and also a bill introduced by my colleague, Mr. BENNET, printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print a letter and the bill which he mentions in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, February 27, 1908.

Hon. VAN VECHTEN OLCOTT.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Bill No. 14369, BENNET, is now before Congressman OVERSTREET'S committee, and is deserving of your most favorable consideration.

During last year we registered 2,100 letters, sold $8,000 in stamps, mostly in small quantities at a time, and issued 1,025 money orders. During the Xmas holidays we weighed 600 packages.

Our total allowance from the Government is at the rate of $4 per week.

The public is deriving great conveniences from these substations, and, noticing this fact, the demands of the public are becoming more and more, and it requires a pretty intelligent and responsible person to attend to a substation properly. Considering further that the Government pays us no rent, and that we take all responsibility in case of theft or robbery, the Government being no loser, these substations would still be very cheap at the new rates as stated in the bill before Congressman OVERSTREET'S committee, while our present compensation is not a fair one.

Earnestly hoping that you will give this bill your kind consideration and support, I am,

Respectfully, FRED'K KLEINSCHMIDT.

[H. R. 14639. Sixtieth Congress, first session. In the House of Representatives, January 21, 1908.]

Mr. BENNET of New York introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed:

A bill to classify certain grades in numbered post-office stations.

Be it enacted, etc., That numbered stations doing post-office business of not over: Class 1, $1,000 worth of money-order business, 500 money-order business and registry transactions, and selling $1,000 worth of stamps, salary to be $100; class 2, $1,500 worth of money-order business, 1,000 money-order business and registry transactions, and selling $2,000 worth of stamps, salary to be $200; class 3, $2,500 worth of money-order business, 1,500 money-order business and registry transactions, and selling $4,000 worth of stamps, salary to be $300; class 4, $3,000 worth of money-order business, 2,000 money-order business and registry transactions, and selling $6,000 worth of stamps, salary to be $400; class 5, $5,000 worth of money-order business, 3,000 money-order business and registry transactions, and selling $8,000 worth of stamps, salary to be $500; class 6, $7,000 worth of money-order business, 3,000 money-order business and registry transactions, and selling $12,000 worth of stamps, salary to be $600; class 7, $9,000 worth of money-order business, 4,000 money-order business and registry transactions, and selling $16,000 worth of stamps, salary to be $700; class 8, $12,000 worth of money-order business, 4,500 money-order business and registry transactions, and selling $20,000 worth of stamps, salary to be $800; class 9, $15,000 worth of money-order business, 5,000 money-order business and registry transactions, and selling $25,000 worth of stamps, salary to be $900; class 10, over above amounts, salary to be $1,000.

In adjusting salaries 500 money-order business and registry transactions shall rate equivalent to $3,000 worth of stamps sold.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 12, lines 2, 3, and 4, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Let us hear the amendment read first.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 12, line 2, by substituting the word "eight" for "seven."
Amend page 12, line 3, by substituting the word "seven" for "six."
Amend page 12, line 4, by substituting the word "six" for "five."
So that lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, page 12, will read, "Watchmen, janitors, and laborers, 430, at $800 each; 225, at $700 each; and 100, at $600 each; in all, $561,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to page 12, lines 2, 3, and 4, for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk has reported.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana objects. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks in charge of contract stations, at a rate of compensation not to exceed $300 each, $525,000.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] or the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] if their committee intends at this session to give a hearing on the bill which my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] has just obtained permission to print in the RECORD.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the gentleman refer to the famous Bennet bill to classify the contract-station clerks?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Omitting the word "famous," I refer to that bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I think it is entirely unfair for any Member to force the chairman of the committee to be put in the light of opposing legislation, but I know of no man who is more ready to take responsibility, if it belongs to him, than I am; and, in view of the methods which the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] has to-day assumed to try and secure hearings, I will state that I can not tell what the committee may recommend, but that I shall oppose hearings upon that bill.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that the chairman of the committee has taken that attitude. It seems to me that my inquiry was a perfectly proper one at this time. It is my recollection that I have applied before for a hearing, and the request seemed to me to be a simple one. Any committee has the right to refuse hearings, and any member of the committee has the right to say that he will vote to refuse a hearing. I do not know, of course, what attitude the committee will take, beside the chairman taking the attitude he has in regard to me, personally. If I thought my inquiry at this time would cause him any embarrassment or even indignation, I am very frank to say it would not have been made in this way. I simply wanted to get the information and felt sure that other Members of the House would. I think the bill itself is a good one, and that there ought to be that classification. Of course, as the chairman says, he can not be forced at this time to say what he will do or what the committee will do. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at first and second class post-offices, and temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter resort post-offices, $240,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry. I want the gentleman in charge of the bill to explain what he means by the language on lines 17 and 18 on page 12, "temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter resort post-offices," which attracted my attention, because I have had trouble about that summer resort question. A great many people from Nashville, my home, go to Mount Eagle Assembly, Tenn., which is a summer resort for church people principally. There are thousands of church people in Nashville and in Tennessee and all over the South, who attend this summer resort, and a great many have written to me asking about having a better mail service, for the people within the limits of these inclosed grounds. I have never been able to find any law or any regulation of the Department to cover that kind of a case.

Mr. OVERSTREET. May I inquire of the gentleman if there is a post-office in that particular place?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, yes; Mount Eagle, while not a large place, has three or four thousand people.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is not important whether or not it is a first or second or third or fourth class office, because this applies to post-offices of all classes that are located at summer and winter resorts, where, during the resort season, there is an unusual amount of business at the office.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman this, that the church premises, as they may be called, at Mount Eagle, are in an inclosure and the Mount Eagle post-office is on the outside. The association is maintained by people who, when they go there, must pay so much for a ticket. They are given summer tickets, and the tickets are punched when they go in or go out and return, so that when they go and get their mail these five or six thousand people on the inside of the premises have to have their tickets punched two or three or four times a day, going in and out. This is a great burden on the people who go there in these mountains, that splendid and beautiful place, to rest and attend church and lectures, and be quiet during the hot summer months that we have in that country.

They have asked me to try to get relief, and hence I have spoken about it. I have had requests from Colonel Shook, one of the officers, and from the late Major Thomas and Captain Pilcher, another officer, who live in Nashville, and a host of other people. I do think that the Post-Office Committee, or Congress, to be entirely general, should take up such cases and provide a law that at least a temporary rural carrier can be employed on the inside of these grounds. That is what I have been trying to get—to get some kind of a carrier who could come through and get that mail and distribute it among the acres of houses inhabited by 5,000 or 6,000 people. Now, then, you have an appropriation here for summer-resort and winter-resort post-offices. Will this appropriation cover that kind of a case?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not think it would cover the case where there would be a carrier appointed to carry the mail from the post-office out to this Chautauqua, or whatever the association may be.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, then, there is another trouble right there. That mail carrier will not go inside to take that mail, because he has to have a ticket, and the rule of the association, or the law, is that that ticket has to be punched. The Government will not send a man to carry the mail into such premises.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not think there will be any authority under this appropriation, either for the mail carrier or for the punching of the tickets.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there any law on the subject that would relieve that kind of a case?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not think there is.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not my friend think there should be?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not know. If an association, educational, religious, or otherwise, seeks to have an organization holding its meetings out from the towns or cities, within inclosures, requiring pay for tickets for patrons, I do not know that it is within the province of the Government to hire employees to carry the mail out to them or to pay for their tickets of entry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment. The Department will not let them have a post-office on the inside. They are obliged to go outside, and they are obliged to have the gate and the fence and the ticket charge in order to get a revenue.

Mr. OVERSTREET. How long does that organization continue?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It continues from about the middle of April until about the 1st of October.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is very difficult to frame a general statute covering all of that character of cases. There are undoubtedly cases of considerable merit, but when you come to frame statutes it is so complicated that it is almost impossible to do it satisfactorily.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that there are enough Chautauquas in the United States—and that is practically what this is—to have what you might call a "Chautauqua law," or "Chautauqua service," or "Chautauqua statute," of some sort?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman will appreciate that is a pretty large subject, and you could not satisfy everybody.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This is an assemblage of great and good people, Mr. Chairman, and they have repeatedly appealed to my colleague, as well as to myself, for relief. Many of my people go there, and they have called on me, very naturally, and they have called on our Senators. I know that my distinguished and able colleague [Mr. MOON] has had the matter in charge. We have conferred together. We do not find any law, and I challenge this matter to the attention of my good friend from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] and the committee, that you may have the facts that I have stated in a hurried way before you, and I do hope sincerely that at an early date you may take this subject up and give relief.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowance to third-class post-offices to cover the cost of clerical services in offices where the salaries of the postmasters range from $1,000 to $1,500, $500,000: Provided, That no allowance in excess of $200 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000, $1,100, or $1,200; nor in excess of $300 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,300, $1,400, or $1,500.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee something about this item. There have been many communications received by all of us, I suppose, in reference to increase of salary or clerk hire for third-class postmasters. This is an appropriation in a lump sum, and I would like to know whether this will increase the salary of the third-class postmasters throughout the country, and how much?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, under the law there are four divisions of the third-class post-offices under which appropriation allowances are made to cover cost of clerical hire.

In offices where the salaries of postmasters are $1,000, $1,100, and $1,200 a year, not to exceed $200 may be allowed in any one office to cover the cost of clerical hire. In the second group, with $1,300, $1,400, and $1,500 a year salaries, a maximum of $300 may be allowed. In the third group, where the salaries are $1,600 and $1,700, an allowance may be made not to exceed $400, and in the fourth group, where the salaries are $1,800 and $1,900, an allowance not to exceed $500 may be given to cover the cost of clerk hire. The committee found upon inquiry that the appropriations that had been carried for some years were not sufficient to warrant anything like the maximum allowance in any of these cases to be granted, and in any event no great per cent could enjoy the maximum allowance.

Where third-class offices are just about ready to ripen into second-class offices the burden of work upon the postmaster of the office is almost as great as in a second-class office just after it has ripened from a third class. Therefore the allowance which the Government has made for the third-class post-offices of the higher classes just approaching the second class will greatly benefit them.

There is no great justification for a high allowance for clerical cost of the lower classes of the third class. Therefore the committee concluded this year to separate the total allowance for third-class offices into two groups, one group to be covered by offices of the third class, where the salaries of the postmasters are from $1,000 to $1,500, inclusive, leaving the schedule for those offices the same as it is now. That is, where the office is $1,000, $1,100, and $1,200, not to exceed $200 a year, and where the salaries are $1,300, $1,400, and $1,500, not to exceed $300 per year; but they make for that first division, covering these groups of third-class offices, an allowance of $500,000, and for the second of these divisions, covering the offices where the salaries are $1,600 to $1,900, inclusive, we make an allowance of $625,000. In the second division are the offices upon which will fall the heavy burden of the service in offices approaching the second class. An allowance of $625,000 is made for this group of offices. This will permit the maximum pay in offices of this division, where the salaries are $1,600, $1,700, $1,800, and $1,900 in over 90 per cent of such offices.

The appropriation of $500,000 for the lower grades of third-class offices will permit the maximum pay of $200 in the offices where the salaries are $1,000, $1,100, and $1,200, and the maximum of $300 where the salaries are $1,300, $1,400, and $1,500, in 59 per cent of the offices of that division.

The total appropriation has been increased by the committee by $325,000 over the current law. It is believed that relief is deserved in these third-class offices. It is believed further that the committee has made reasonable and perhaps adequate allowance to afford the proper relief.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I was speaking in the time of the gentleman from Nebraska. I will take time in my own right.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I am interested as the Representative of my district in these third-class post-offices, and have had several letters from postmasters upon the subject now being considered. I desire to ask who it is that determines the pay that they are entitled to for clerk hire in the third-class offices?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, the law itself fixes the maximum allowance under the schedule which I have just explained. Then the First Assistant Postmaster-General determines the allowance upon the character and volume of the business of these respective offices.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I understand there is a minimum and a maximum allowance for that purpose.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The law fixes the maximum.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The postmaster in the particular town where I reside writes me that the receipts of the office approach very nearly to the amount that would make it a second-class office. That is, they are almost $8,000 a year, at which point I believe an office becomes second class; but under the law he has been permitted to receive only $360 a year for clerk hire.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have just explained to the committee that the provision of the bill we are now discussing allows enough money to pay clerk hire to third-class offices, which would include the office that the gentleman refers to, a maximum allowance of $500 in 92 per cent of the cases.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. That is the question I wanted to ask. My postmaster writes me—and I have the letter before me now—that he understands that the Postmaster-General or one of the assistants recommended an appropriation of $2,000,000, and he understands that this amount, if appropriated, would authorize the Post-Office Department to pay him an increased amount, which is, I think, in his case very just. I see by the provisions of this bill the appropriation asked for is only $1,125,000, and may even forbid the payment to third-class postmasters the present maximum rates.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; the $2,000,000 recommendation carries with it a second recommendation, to repeal the schedules provided by law and give them a lump sum of $2,000,000 and let them fix their own maximum and minimum allowances. The committee has felt that it is well to maintain the schedule which the law has carried for some years, but has appropriated enough money, in the judgment of the committee, to permit the maximum allowance in the higher grade third-class offices in over 90 per cent of the cases.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The chairman of the committee, then, believes that this appropriation we are making will justify the Department in paying the maximum amount of clerk hire now authorized by law if the work justifies it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. To the extent of about 92½ per cent of the cases. It would not in 100 per cent of the cases, but if the appropriation is sufficient to pay the maximum in 92 per cent of the cases, why, naturally, there would be some offices that would not receive the full maximum, and perhaps they would not deserve the full maximum, while others would receive it.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, and it seems to my friends in my district, that there is an unjust discrimination in the payment to postmasters for clerical hire in the third-class post-offices, for the reason, as this gentleman writes me, that the receipts of his office are now about $7,000 a year, approaching nearly the place where it will be entitled to become a second-class office, and that he has been paid for clerical hire only $360 per annum. The maximum amount that he can receive, if this appropriation is sufficient to permit it, will be $500 a year; but with an increase of $1,000 in receipts in that office it would become a second-class office, and then the minimum allowance would be $1,300 for clerk hire. So it seems to me that there is, under the present law, an unjust disparity in the payment of the clerical hire in these different classes of post-offices. I was especially anxious to know whether this appropriation would justify or permit the payment of the maximum amount now allowed by law, which is $500, or $140 more than has heretofore been paid to the postmaster in my home town.

I desire to protest against this great and very unjust discrimination in the allowance for clerk hire in favor of the second-class offices and against the third-class offices, that in many cases do almost the same volume of business as the second-class offices. The same service deserves the same remuneration wherever performed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. While the gentleman is discussing hardships in the service I want to suggest to him that in the town of Gary, in northwestern Indiana, there is a post-office of the fourth class. The emoluments of the postmaster are $999 a year, and it costs him $1,700 a year for rent, light, fuel, and clerk hire to administer the office. He still holds on to it. We hope in a few weeks that it will go into the third class. But that situation is extraordinary. The postmaster is paying out of his pocket $700 or $800 a year more that he receives from the Government, to handle the office. I think a special allowance has been made out of the "unusual" fund of $200. The officer in charge of the salary and allowance business at the Post-Office Department told me that that postmaster had been a little backward about coming forward. He said he recognized the fact that the situation at Gary was extraordinary, and he would send an inspector out and might possibly allow the postmaster a little more money. It will be a third-class office before long, and I suppose that now the postmaster receives his pay largely in the honor that comes to him in being postmaster of the town of Gary.

Mr. MANN. In the gentleman's district?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is adjoining my district, and that is distinction enough for anybody. [Laughter.]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska is withdrawn, and the gentleman from South Carolina offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 2, before the word "thousand," insert the word "twenty-five," so that it will read "$525,000."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no objection to that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Indiana a question. Does the gentleman think there is any danger that this proviso as to the amount which may be allowed might be construed as a limitation upon the allowances other than those contained in this paragraph?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not at all; it is impossible for it to be construed that way.

Mr. YOUNG. Has it been construed by the Department in the past?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can not see how it is possible. For instance, a third-class office may have an allowance under the appropriation for separating the mails, and may have an allowance from the appropriation under the appropriation for unusual conditions. They are all different appropriations and under different conditions which may prevail.

Mr. YOUNG. The language is general—that "no allowance in excess of $200," etc.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is a limitation on this particular appropriation contained in this paragraph.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman have any objection to an amendment, "Provided, That no allowance under this provision," and so forth?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I should object to that, because if that were permitted I should feel that it would be necessary to go to every other paragraph in the bill where it might be possible to construe it otherwise.

Mr. YOUNG. I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that this has been practically construed in former bills as applying to this paragraph.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I know in a general way that the allowances to these offices are made from different funds.

Mr. YOUNG. And all taken together they exceed this limitation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no particular case that I can cite directly, but I have not the slightest fear of any such a construction.

Mr. MANN. This has been practically the permanent law for years.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes. I understand the gentleman from Michigan to ask if the allowance has been made, where the total amount is in excess of this, in the schedule.

Mr. YOUNG. That is it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rental or purchase of canceling machines, including cost of power in rented buildings, motors, repairs to motors, and miscellaneous expenses of installation and operation, $300,000.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, page 14, amend to read as follows: "Eight hundred thousand dollars: Provided, however, That after the expiration of the present contract no canceling machines shall be used in any post-office unless the same shall be acquired by purchase."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. A few days ago, Mr. Chairman, I referred to this matter of the renting of canceling machines and pronounced it a poor business method. I am in favor of all machines that may add to the efficiency of the work in any Department, but I protest against the renting of these machines. They ought to be acquired by purchase. As I stated the other day, there are now in use in the post-offices of the country 1,540 machines, at an annual rental of $256,920. They are now asking $300,000 for the same purpose.

Now, I find in looking over the report of three years back that these firms that have rented these machines have been good to us in some ways; they have not raised the rental except in a few cases, but they have not, whenever the number of machines in use has increased, lowered the price. I herewith submit a detailed statement showing the number and rental price each per annum of the several kinds of canceling machines contracted for by the Department for use in the fiscal years beginning July 1, 1904, 1905, and 1906:

Made by—	1904-5.		1905-6.		1906-7.

As is shown in the foregoing statement, the American Postal Machine Company, of Boston, furnished in 1904 sixty-four machines of the so-called "Combination" at a rental of $150 a year. They are now furnishing 225 of the same kind and pattern at the same rental per machine, thereby making no reduction for a greatly increased number of machines. I say that we ought to buy these machines or not use them at all. We should return to the old methods of cancellation if the manufacturers of these machines continue to "hold up" the Government and demand exorbitant rental instead of permitting the Government to buy them outright. There is to-day in the Washington post-office a canceling machine doing good work which was procured from Europe, and it is being offered at outright sale for $800, while a similar machine is rented to us by some of these postal supply companies for $400 a year. I say it is high time to take steps to check this high-handed method of giving away the people's money.

I have in my amendment asked for an appropriation of $800,000 for the purchase of all machines necessary for the postal service, which is but $500,000 more than is asked for the mere rental of these machines. I believe that the $800,000 will buy every necessary machine, and that there will be quite a sum left over.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I took pains the other day to listen attentively to my distinguished colleague when he made his criticism of this item for the rental and purchase of canceling machines. I regret that I can not follow him to the extent that he recommended, that it would be more economical for the Government, even though it could not purchase these high-grade Hey & Dolphin "Flier" machines, for which we pay an annual rental of $400, to discontinue their use and place employees in the offices and have the stamps canceled by hand. Any person who is acquainted with the work of this expert machine, which is patented, must know that it would require very many men by hand to perform the work that is performed by this one machine, which cancels in the neighborhood of a thousand stamped envelopes a minute, and further, it would clog the mails of the large offices if we were to go back to the old days of having the poor grade machines for cancellation. There are five or six different makes in use in the Post-Office Department, but there is only one machine that has that high record, and the Department is forced to use it because of the congested conditions which confront the postal service during the closing hours of the mail in all of our large cities.

The Post-Office Department places these high-grade machines in the offices where they are most urgently needed. Take, for instance, the conditions in New York, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia—in fact, any of the largest offices in the country—and the mail comes in during the hours from 4 to 6 in the afternoon in such quantities that it is imperatively necessary to use this exceptionally high-speed machine, else the mail of the country would be delayed in many instances just twenty-four hours in its dispatch. Any person who has visited the Chicago or the New York office at the closing hours of the day, when the mail comes in by tons—first-class mail, not newspaper mail—will know that it is necessary to have that mail dispatched to the respective routes as quickly as possible. It would be idle for any person to say that we should resort to the old-time methods of hand cancellation.

Now, what is the condition as to this Hey & Dolphin "Flier," for which we pay an annual rental of $400? Mr. Postmaster-General Wanamaker attempted to purchase these canceling machines, but the owners of the patents declined, and for a period of time they were withdrawn, I believe, if my recollection serves me right, for at least one year, by order of Mr. Wanamaker, in his efforts to compel the owners to sell the machines outright to the Government. The result was that the service was hampered, and Postmaster-General Wanamaker was forced to reinstall those machines, because it was urgently necessary to expedite sending the mails.

The Department has the privilege of purchasing under this item for rental or purchase, and if my colleague is acquainted with the conditions in the service to-day he knows that the Government has in its possession as owner certain low-grade machines, but it is absolutely impossible to get the right of ownership of these high-grade machines. What is the practical question before the committee and before the Department? Either to go back to an obsolete method and cancel stamps by hand or to use inferior grade machines that will retard the mail service, or by using these high-grade machines, over which the patentees have an absolute control, and obtain efficient and expeditious service.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman a question. How many of these canceling machines are now used by the Government?

Mr. STAFFORD. One thousand two hundred and forty-eight on February 14 of last year.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. One thousand five hundred and forty.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg to say that 1,248 machines were in use on February 14, 1907.

Mr. SULZER. How much rental a year does the Government pay for each machine?

Mr. STAFFORD. At the present time there are 1,540 machines in use, of which 259 are the Hey & Dolphin "Flier," for which we pay a rental of $400, amounting to $106,300; 72 machines made by the same company, known as model "S," for which a rental of $150 is paid; another model manufactured by the same company, model "L," of which 183 are in use, for which we pay a rental of $90; another made by the American Postal Machine Company of Massachusetts, known as the "Combination," of which 385 are in use, and for which we pay a rental of $150; another, known as the "Drop-feed" machine, made by the same company, of which 286 are in use, and for which we pay $100 in rental.

Mr. NORRIS. That is $100 each a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; each year. Another, known as the "Hand-power" machine, of which 215 are used, at $80 a year; another, manufactured by the Columbia Postal Supply Company, at Silver Creek, N. Y., of which 68 are in use, and for which we pay $150 annual rental. The Barry Postal Supply Company, of Oswego, N. Y., makes another, of which there are 62 in use, and for which we pay a rental of $150. Then there is a machine made by the Time Marking Machine Company, of Chicago, of which we have 10, and for which we pay an annual rental of $300. I wish to say that these lower-priced machines are the machines that do not cancel stamped letters and postal cards with any such speed as do the higher-priced machines, such as the Hey & Dolphin "Flier" and the time-marking machine manufactured at Chicago.

The speed of those machines is something like ten times, if my memory serves me correctly, of that of the lower-priced machines, the lower-priced machines being installed, as I stated a minute ago, in the smaller offices, and used during the slack times of the day in the larger offices. And I wish to say that under the contract of rental the owners of the machines are obliged to keep all the parts in repair.

Mr. SULZER. So I understand. But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask another question in this connection. I wish to know from the gentleman, if he has the information, whether any effort has been made on the part of the Government to purchase these canceling machines?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Government has in use to-day a number of canceling machines known as the "Doremus type," purchased many years ago, and which did not prove very efficacious in their operation. They are found at present in the smaller post-offices. The committee inquired of the First Assistant Postmaster-General two years ago when this matter was under consideration as to what efforts had been made to purchase these machines, and, as I recall, he said it was impossible to obtain by purchase any of these high-grade machines, because the owner of the patent absolutely refused to sell them. They still maintain the same position they maintained when Postmaster-General Wanamaker was at the head of the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Postmaster-General Wanamaker, as I stated a minute ago, sought to force the owners of these machines to sell them, and they absolutely refused. They were withdrawn from the service for a period of at least a year, and the Department was compelled to have them put back in the service. And I would like at this moment to direct the attention of my colleague to the debates of three or four years ago, when he will see that at that time I called the attention of the House, when the matter was under consideration, to the difficulty that confronted the Department, and that the remedy was not by hampering the postal service and compelling the Post-Office Department to have the stamps canceled by hand, but by changing the patent laws so as to give the Government—not only in this case, but in any case—the right of appropriation at a reasonable compensation when it has use for any patented device. It is not the place here, and it is not the proper way, to seek by amendment something that might hamper the postal service and will cause millions and millions of letters to be delayed in their transit.

The very purpose of the whole service is to expedite the mail wherever it is practicable. We have established fast mail trains, for which we pay large compensation, so as to bring the mails to the large business houses twelve hours in advance of what it would be if they had the slower conveyance.

Mr. SULZER. Just a word. I am substantially in accord with the gentleman's remarks regarding a change in the patent laws. I have been on the Patent Committee of this House for several years, and I have advocated a change in the patent laws, to the effect that when the Government gives a monopoly to an inventor, and the Government needs the invention for its own use, the Government shall have the right to use the invention at a reasonable consideration. But the question I want the gentleman to inform me about is this: I want to know whether an effort has been made to buy these machines from the owners, and if no attempt has been made, why it has not been made?

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe it was disclosed in the hearings, though I would not trust my memory absolutely on that fact—it was not brought out in the hearings this year, but I believe in prior hearings—that such an effort was made and the Department was unable to purchase the machines.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, now another question. No doubt the gentleman has made careful investigation into this matter, and I would like him to tell us, if he can, whether, in his opinion, these rental charges are reasonable or unreasonable.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman wants to know my opinion about it, I will say frankly that the rental charge of this high-grade machine is more than I would say was compensatory, but it is the condition that confronts any user of a patented article that the patentee has the right to charge that rental which he can obtain for the service.

Mr. SULZER. In other words, the owner of these machines, on account of the Government granting him a patent, which is a monopoly, is charging the Government extortionate rentals.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not say extortionate, but high rental, but only for one grade of machine, not for those where the rental is $150 or thereabouts, but merely for the high-grade machine.

Mr. SULZER. Then the gentleman's judgment is that the rents for some of the machines are exorbitant?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not exorbitant, but higher than they would be if there was no patent. The gentleman well knows that a patentee charges a higher price, as he has a monopoly in the manufacture and sale, than would be charged if no such privilege was granted him by the patent laws.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, then it seems to me that the only remedy to prevent these high rentals by the owners of these canceling machines is to change the patent laws so the Government can use them at a reasonable rental charge; especially if the Government can not purchase the machines at a fair price. I indulge the hope that the officials having this matter in charge will give it careful investigation.

Mr. DRISCOLL. There is no difficulty, in extending patents, to protect the Government in these cases.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know as to that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin permit me to interrogate the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will, gladly.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman familiar with the bill reported from the committee of which he is a distinguished member, extending the power of the patentee against the Government under such restrictions——

Mr. SULZER. No; I know of no such case. I am opposed to it, and I hope the gentleman will stand by me in opposition to it.

Mr. MANN. It was not reported by the committee of which I am a member. It came from the committee of which the gentleman is a distinguished member.

Mr. SULZER. The bill has not been reported with my consent.

Mr. MANN. I hold the report in my hand [laughter], and for the benefit of the gentleman in order to help him along, I will say it is report No. 184, and I commend it to his consideration.

Mr. SULZER. Let me see it.

Mr. MANN. It is my copy.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was giving my views to the committee about the patent.

Mr. MANN. I want to get the gentleman from New York on my side on that bill.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that he can count on me to be with him in opposition to the bill to which he refers. I am now, and always have been, opposed to any extension of a patent. I want to say that while I have been a member of the Committee on Patents I have always opposed, in season and out of season, any extension of a patent, because a patent is a monopoly, and I am opposed to any extension of a monopoly. I know nothing about the bill the gentleman refers to, but I trust when the bill comes up, if it does come up, that my friend from Illinois will help me defeat it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. What kind of a bill was it?

Mr. SULZER. I have just seen it, and will say that the bill was introduced by a distinguished Republican Member of this House [Mr. DALZELL] and reported by a Republican member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I wanted to say something about the change of patent law. It looks to me like the Government is being held up by the manufacturer of these canceling machines; but there is no principle better settled in law than that an invention is property, and patent right can no more be confiscated or taken by the Government than any other class of property. I doubt the power of Congress to deprive any inventor of his rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana, does he contend——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman half a minute.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Indiana contend that when the Government issues a patent that the patentee has any right or claim against the Government legally?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Just the same as if the Government uses his horse, his house, or his farm. A patent right is property, and the man who makes an invention under the law that gives him a property right in it is protected as much in that as in any other class of property.

Mr. MANN. I do not propose to take issue with the gentleman on that, but I commend the opinion of the gentleman to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HINSHAW], and I commend the report of the gentleman from Nebraska to the gentleman from Indiana, because in the report made to the House it states that the patentee has no legal claim against the Government, and it struck me as a rather unusual doctrine. I call that to the attention of the gentleman from Indiana, knowing that he is one of the greatest lawyers in the House.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The theory of that report doubtless is that there is no remedy against the Government on the ground that you can not sue the Government. But it is well settled in all the civilized world that the inventor of an idea or a mechanism has property in his invention.

Mr. MANN. I was talking about a legal claim against the Government.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And if a man has a legal right in the enjoyment of his own property he has a legal right to its protection. He has no remedy against the sovereign or against the Government, but his legal right exists nevertheless.

Mr. MANN. He has no legal right against the Government unless he has a legal remedy against the Government.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He would have a legal right to enjoin the Government from appropriating his patent.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will have to decline to yield further. Now I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I just wish to refer to one matter mentioned by my colleague as to whether or not the rental is an exorbitant one. The canceling machine now on trial in the Washington post-office and doing satisfactory work is offered by the European manufacturers at $800, and the American Postal Supply Companies are charging us for similar machines a rental of $400 a year, which I say is exorbitant in consideration of the fact that twice that sum purchases the machine outright.

They have in use in some offices another machine, a hand machine, that works quite satisfactorily, which was bought for $225, and we are paying $80 and $90 a year rent for a similar type of machine. Now, I say, if the manufacturers of the machines refuse to sell us them outright, it may cripple us for a little while, but it will bring the manufacturers to time, for they will not entirely destroy the goose that lays the golden egg.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman, that Postmaster-General Wanamaker, for whom I have the highest respect, and during whose administration of the Post-Office Department more improvements were inaugurated than for a quarter of a century before, attempted that, and he found that it was not possible to force the owners of a patented article to sell those machines.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Just referring to the subject of the renting of canceling machines, I find that taking out those machines by Postmaster-General Wanamaker undoubtedly did the Post-Office Department some harm, but it bankrupted the owners of the machines. If they do not want to do what is right, let them be bankrupted again. Let them throw the old machines on the scrap pile.

Mr. STAFFORD. That would compel us to sacrifice the interests of the postal service, delay the dispatch of letters twelve hours to twenty-four hours, in the larger offices, and may incur a loss of perhaps millions of dollars to the business men of the country, who demand and require the quickest possible mail dispatch. The gentleman's proposition is that if we can not purchase them we should hamper and injure the service irreparably, in order to prevent some company making a large profit, because it controls a patent. That is a policy to which I do not subscribe. The only possible and practicable remedy that I can see is to change the patent laws.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pro forma amendment is exhausted. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] insist on the point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I insist on the point of order. It is clearly subject to the point of order in my judgment, because it in terms prohibits the rental of machines.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the matter, the renting of machines is now authorized by law. This amendment would prohibit it. Therefore it is a change of existing law and in violation of the rule of the House which prohibits a change of existing law upon a general appropriation bill, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to ten assistant superintendents salary and allowance division, at the rate of $2,000 per annum each, and for their per diem allowance when actually traveling on business of the Post-Office Department, at a rate to be fixed by the Postmaster-General not to exceed $4 per day, and for other necessary official expenses, $34,600.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Two or three years ago I investigated this question of canceling machines and came to the conclusion that the Government was being held up by the manufacturers. I offered an amendment to the post-office appropriation bill, which did not prevail, and I want now to incorporate as a part of my remarks what was said in that debate. I do not believe, notwithstanding these machines are convenient, that the Government of the United States ought to permit itself to be held up in any such style. I hope that before the next appropriation bill is made up the post-office authorities will inquire and will be able to report to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads what rental is paid in Great Britain, Germany, France, and other great countries for the use of canceling machines.

The debate referred to is as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, in Document 383, second session Fifty-eighth Congress, there is a very interesting story about the canceling machines rented and purchased by the Government. The First Assistant Postmaster-General testified before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that the Department had endeavored in making rental contracts with the owners of these machines to incorporate in the contracts a clause giving the Government the right to purchase. He further stated that all of the companies had refused to incorporate this clause in their contract. There are two parties who can play the hold-up game. Some of these canceling machines are rented to the Government for as much as $400 a year. This document which I hold in my hand shows that canceling machines were rented in some instances for more than twice what it costs to construct them. There are about eight companies making canceling machines.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If your amendment does not prescribe any method by which the amount of the purchase price of a canceling machine shall be fixed, what real benefit would it be to the Government to have that kind of a stipulation in the contract, because the owner of the machine could fix the price at such a figure that the Government could not purchase it? It seems to me that in order to make your amendment effective it ought to contain some provision by which the price of the canceling machine should be arrived at.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a very happy suggestion, and I shall be glad to accept any amendment which will effect what I am trying to accomplish. Of course the machines are of different prices, and the rentals are different. The purchasing price would be different; but I assume that under this provision, if it were adopted, the Post-Office Department would not insert a clause in the lease to purchase, except at a figure they were willing to pay, if they decided to purchase.

Mr. NORRIS. Just from hearing your amendment read, as I understood it, the Post-Office Department would not have that authority. The man who owns the machines could put in any figure he saw fit, which would nullify what you are trying to reach.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I have already stated, if the amendment as drafted is not sufficient to accomplish the purpose, let us so draft it that it will accomplish that purpose. These companies making the canceling machines are renting them to the Government at exorbitant prices. They refuse to sell because the Government pays them an annual rental that in most cases, I dare say, would be a handsome price for them if they were selling the machines outright.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope the House will give me five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is a business proposition. It seems to me that if we provide in the law that these gentlemen can not rent their machines to the Government unless they are willing to meet the Government on a fair, equitable, conscientious basis, that we will accomplish our purpose. The Government is not obliged to rent any one of these machines. If these people are made to understand that the Government will no longer be held up by them, they will come to terms, because there can be no other purchaser and no other renter in the United States. I hope that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will consent to incorporate this amendment into their bill, and trust before the next session of Congress we will have from that committee information as to the cost of these machines, and then we can legislate more wisely and understandingly on the question.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Does the gentleman know whether or not any of these canceling machines are for sale at any price, or do the manufacturers lease them and refuse to sell?

Mr. JOHNSON. The Government has purchased in years past a large number of machines, as shown in this document, but the First Assistant Postmaster-General, in testifying before this committee that was making up this particular bill, stated that he was unable now to purchase or to get the companies to insert an option to purchase in the leases. I want to fix it so that if they are not willing to deal with us fairly they can not deal with us at all.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Then, as a matter of fact, the manufacturers are holding the Government up and getting almost the entire price out of each machine each year?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think so.

Mr. MANN. This matter was thrashed out in the House some years ago at great length. I am rather in sympathy with the gentlemen who believe that the Post-Office Department ought to own these machines, but the mere statement that a machine costs so much and that the rental is so much has nothing to do with the case. We pay a great deal more for the care of a horse per annum in the Post-Office Department than the horse is worth, but that is no test. The decrepit cripples that deliver the House mail are under the absolute control of the House itself, not under the Government, but the House, and we pay something over $400 for the use of those cripples hauling the mail wagons around. It might be possible that some distinguished gentlemen who are anxious for reform would wish to provide that the Government should own the horses. Now, it may be contended that you can keep a horse for no less than that.

There are 600 horses and mules in the control of the Isthmian Canal Commission on the Isthmus. The Commission reports that last year the average expense for taking care of these horses and mules, including the charges for labor, forage, and miscellaneous items, was about $110 per horse. They asked for bids to see what it would cost to keep the horses, and the least bid they received was $450 per year per horse.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who bid?

Mr. MANN. The proposal was received from a contractor of the United States who had had considerable experience in similar work in Central America, and he proposed to keep the horses for $450 apiece, as against $110 which it was costing the Commission. But that does not signify anything as to whether it would be to the advantage of the Government or the House to own the horses. We are paying in Chicago $380 for the use of a horse and wagon, a little collection wagon; it is a great deal more than the horse is worth. It might be far cheaper for the Government to buy the horses. Certainly there would not be the same difference in that value that there is in regard to the machines, and it is far better, in my judgment, to rent the high-grade machines that require the most careful handling and are so liable to get out of order, and require the renter to keep them in order, than it is to rent the horses. It is not much trouble to take care of a horse, especially the kind of horses and the kind of care that are in the service of the Government. It is a great deal of trouble to take care of these machines.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Can the gentleman state how much it costs to take care of one of these machines a year?

Mr. MANN. I do not know what it costs. The people who furnish the machines keep them in repair.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It does not cost half as much for them to keep them in repair as it would cost the Government.

Mr. MANN. No; not if they were used and taken care of by the Government. If they were used and taken care of by the post-office employees, it would cost probably ten times what it costs now. These clerks are not qualified for the work, they are not selected for the work, and while undoubtedly in the long run it may be desirable to have the Government own machines that are not too intricate and too highly organized and can be run easily, it is out of the question, in the postal service that we have now, to have these machines taken care of and repaired by Government clerks at any less cost than is now done.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. What would the gentleman say to a proposition to have the Government purchase the machines with a guaranty on the part of the maker that the maker keep the machines in repair?

Mr. MANN. That is an impossible proposition, in my judgment. I think it would be desirable for the Government to purchase some machines and operate them and see how it compares in cost with those that we rent. We can only ascertain by experiment, but to do away with the machines, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN]—there isn't half room enough in the Chicago post-office building today to furnish the tables and the places for the clerks to stand to cancel the mail that goes through that office, if the canceling machines were done away with.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much does the Government pay for rent now?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has stated $80 to $400 apiece.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much in all?

Mr. MANN. The appropriation is $300,000 proposed in the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from Illinois will admit that there isn't room enough in the Chicago post-office recently constructed for the proper administration of the postal work, even with the canceling machines.

Mr. MANN. There is not room enough in that part of the building devoted to postal service, but I say there isn't room enough in the whole building devoted to all the services to furnish means to cancel all the mail by hand.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] that the whole amount, the aggregate expenditure for canceling machines last year was $256,920.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. For how many machines?

Mr. STAFFORD. Fifteen hundred and forty.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How long have we been paying that?

Mr. STAFFORD. That has been the practice for more than a decade.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, the pending paragraph provides for compensation to ten assistant superintendents, salary and allowance division, and as I understand it, the principal duties of these officials are similar in nature to those of inspectors, and there does not seem to be any very good reason why they should not be included in the regular inspection force of the Post-Office Department. I have been informed by my friend the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], that it is in consideration to consolidate all the inspection officers of the Post-Office Department in one force under the immediate direction of the Postmaster-General in the reorganization of that Department, and I simply rise at this time to express my firm conviction that that is called for by the best interests of intelligent and efficient administration. There is much of the work of the Post-Office Department that ought to be administratively audited, which is not usually done. Sometimes when it is, it is but feebly done, and this in the bureau in which the work is performed, by the very officers who have conducted it, and if they are in error as to their methods or functions under the law, that error attaches to their audit and review, and there is no correction or chance for correction.

If officers or employees under a different chief were brought in to audit that work, there might be a different result. Take, for example, all these large special allowances that are made to different post-offices in the country, aggregating hundreds of thousands of dollars. The basis for determining those allowances is fixed by the Postmaster-General in a general rule and each particular allowance is calculated and declared in the bureau or division to which it appertains, and is reviewed by nobody outside. Nominally it must be approved by the Assistant Postmaster-General under whose direction the division is, but practically, as all know, the Postmaster-General and the Assistant Postmasters-General can not give attention to that sort of detail, and it was because of that absence of review of these and similar matters that the abuse of powers in the division of salaries and allowances grew a few years ago under the then superintendent who became general superintendent, and subsequently went to prison. There is no different provision at this time for reviewing the work of that division from what there was in those days. The only additional guaranty, as I understand it, that the Department and the country has that those allowances are being honestly made is in the personality of the official who is at the head of the division. He undoubtedly justifies the confidence reposed in him, but however honest he may be, he may also be liable to error and there ought to be somebody, as I have suggested, from outside of that division to review all the action taken in apportioning allowances to different persons and different officers, and in like manner the accounting in other divisions should be audited by persons not in those respective divisions.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WANGER. The Auditor for the Post-Office Department accepts, and under existing law is probably bound to accept, as conclusive the allowance by the Postmaster-General to any postmaster within the limits of an appropriation. He has no means for determining, and apparently it is not his function to determine, whether the allowance is in conformity with the rule established under which the allowance was made; and hence it was in the case of the Kansas post-office—where under the rule of the Department an allowance of only $80 was permissible, the postmaster was annually paid $500—that the crime was not discovered and its repetition after the first year prevented by the Auditor.

The chief inspector has a fund, often exceeding $40,000 and rarely falling below $25,000, of moneys officially received and disbursed, deposited in the interim in a national bank selected by one of his predecessors with the supposed approval of the then Postmaster-General, the accounts of which are seldom examined save upon a change of incumbents and then by those who have served under the outgoing and hope to serve under the incoming chief. If this fund is to be under the continual control of the chief inspector and not be required to be deposited in the Treasury, good administration would suggest quarterly audit by accountants in no sense beholden to the person most vitally interested in the result of the audit. Further illustrations might be given, but these sufficiently illustrate the importance of effectively providing for the enforcement of the principle.

Possibly the Postmaster-General will provide regulations to meet most of these contingencies, as he has for many others, but regulations are only temporary, and such essentials of safety should not be neglected in legislation.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for carriers absent without pay, city delivery service, $26,650,000.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 22, page 14, strike out $26,650,000 and insert in lieu thereof $27,835,000.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment that I promised my colleague [Mr. OVERSTREET] I would present, with a view of increasing the salaries of letter carriers. The amendment, if adopted, will promote approximately 11,200 city letter carriers, and that would require an appropriation of $1,120,000 and would promote about 1,300 carriers now receiving either $1,000 or $1,100, and that would require an appropriation of about $65,000, so that the total increase, as proposed by my amendment, will be $1,185,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will simply increasing the amount appropriated operate in and of itself as a promotion of these various classes of carriers?

Mr. GOEBEL. It will take those who are now in the $1,100 grade and promote them to the $1,200 grade.

Mr. RYAN. It will promote them, but will it require it? Will it make it mandatory?

Mr. GOEBEL. It will make it mandatory. It makes it mandatory whenever we make the appropriation. On yesterday my colleague [Mr. OVERSTREET] and I did not agree in reference to the classification relating to clerks. I think we do agree that up to last year there was no classification of letter carriers in first-class offices. All letter carriers up to that time received $1,000. Last year we created six grades. One of the grades was $1,100, and the next higher was $1,200. We also made sufficient appropriation to cover the $1,100 grade, so that during the present fiscal year letter carriers who had been receiving $1,000 and had been in the service for a year were raised to the $1,100 grade. Now, then, this year the committee failed to recommend and include in the appropriation bill a sufficient amount of money to raise the $1,100 carriers into the $1,200 grade. The object of my amendment, therefore, is to raise these carriers from the grade of $1,100 into the $1,200 grade.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why has not provision been made for the increase provided by law?

Mr. GOEBEL. That is exactly what I have been endeavoring to find out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is a member of the committee, and I thought perhaps there was some general policy involved, and he might give the information to the committee.

Mr. GOEBEL. I can only say to the gentleman from New York that the reason urged by the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, and I may say acquiesced in by a majority of the members of that committee, was that this year there ought to be no increase, for the simple reason that the postal receipts have decreased, and that the conditions of that Department relating to receipts did not warrant or justify this appropriation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it was not intended when the bill was passed by the last Congress creating this $1,200 class of letter carriers that some of the $1,100 class should be promoted into it, and whether it was not also intended to appropriate enough money for that purpose?

Mr. GOEBEL. I want to say to the gentleman that that was my understanding, and I believed at the time that this year we would make the appropriation for the $1,200 grade.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment should be agreed to. It is only fair and just to the letter carriers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GOEBEL. In just a minute.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, it is the understanding of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL], who was a member of this committee, that the committee intended to create a $1,200 class of carriers and intended to appropriate enough money to pay those $1,200 carriers?

Mr. GOEBEL. I do not want to be misunderstood by the gentleman. He probably goes too far when he says it was the understanding of the committee. I did not mean to say that that was an understanding by the committee, but what I do mean to say is that I thought there was an understanding.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the gentleman has no assurances and no evidence that the committee intended when it created this $1,200 class of carriers to provide any means for any men to get into that class?

Mr. GOEBEL. I had no assurance from that committee. But manifestly it was the intention of that committee at that time in creating this $1,200 class that at the proper time Congress would make an appropriation for that class.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Did not the bill provide that the proper time should be the 30th of June, 1907?

Mr. GOEBEL. No; not necessarily.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me read to the gentleman:

> That after June 30, 1907, clerks in offices of the first and second class, and carriers in the city delivery service, shall be divided into six grades, as follows.

Then the grades are specified, including the $1,200 class of carriers and clerks. So that the proper time to have begun the promotion of these $1,100 carriers into the $1,200 class was on the 30th of June, 1907?

Mr. GOEBEL. Not necessarily. You may create a class and fail to make an appropriation for it, and it would not go into effect.

Now, it was thought advisable last year to create these two classes, but it was also thought advisable that there should be an appropriation made sufficient to carry into effect the $1,100 grade, leaving it for the present Congress to make an appropriation so as to include the $1,200 grade.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the gentleman amends his former statement and now avers that it was not intended in this bill, which created a $1,200 class, to make any provision for any men to get into that class?

Mr. GOEBEL. No; I do not want to be understood as amending my statement. I want to be understood that the $1,100 and the $1,200 grades were established with a view of making an appropriation at some time to cover the two classes, but that under certain conditions then existing it was advisable that there should be an appropriation simply for the $1,100 grade, and that the following year, to wit, this year, we might follow it up by making an appropriation for the $1,200 grade.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask one more question, if the gentleman please. Is there any provision in the present bill for the promotion of a single carrier into the $1,200 class?

Mr. GOEBEL. None. And my amendment provides and will place them in this $1,200 class. That can not be done unless you make the necessary appropriation. So that the creating of the $1,200 class is of no force unless you make the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman's amendment provide funds sufficient to advance all of the carriers now receiving $1,100 to the $1,200 class?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes, sir; and I have the figures. I received them from the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SULZER. And that should be done.

Mr. MANN. What is the number?

Mr. GOEBEL. Does the gentleman mean the amount?

Mr. MANN. The number of carriers.

Mr. GOEBEL. Eleven thousand two hundred.

Mr. RYAN. In the law enacted last year, following up the language that was read by the gentleman from Nebraska, it goes further and says:

> Clerks and carriers in first-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fifth grade.

It provided a sixth grade, but no means of promotion to that grade.

Now, then, even if you do provide the money necessary to carry into effect the original intention of the law, can you make any promotions to that grade unless you amend the act promoting clerks in the paragraph of last year alluded to?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio may be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. GOEBEL. I can not answer the gentleman whether that would require an amendment. I am inclined to think it would not, because they go automatically into that grade, and the appropriations cover that grade. If I am, however, mistaken my colleague [Mr. OVERSTREET], will correct me. I am inclined to think it requires no amendment.

Mr. RYAN. I think it does.

Mr. GOEBEL. I will be very glad to answer any further question.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is quite confident that the very fact of making this appropriation proposed by his amendment will carry into effect last year's legislation?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes, sir; I am absolutely sure.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman's amendment affect carriers in the cities below 50,000?

Mr. GOEBEL. It only applies to first-class offices.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 14, lines 22 and 23, strike out the words "twenty-six million six hundred and fifty thousand dollars," and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-seven million two hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred dollars: Provided, That of the amount herein provided not less than the sum of $592,500 shall be expended for increasing the salaries of 50 per cent of the carriers in the city delivery service who shall be promoted after June 30, 1908, from the fifth to the sixth grade in a manner to be prescribed by the Postmaster-General."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment because I could not hear all of it read. It may not be subject to the point of order.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, my amendment aims at the same object as that of the gentleman from Ohio, except that I provide by my amendment for the advancement of 50 per cent of the carriers now eligible, by virtue of being in the $1,100 class, to the $1,200 grade. I am in accord with every syllable uttered by the gentleman from Ohio. When the Fifty-ninth Congress closed its business last year every man in this House, with the exception of a very few, was under the impression that when we created the $1,200 class of carriers we had placed a live statute upon the book. When we had gone to our homes and conveyed that welcome news to the carriers of the country, who were entitled to and who expected that promotion, that they would receive it, and later found that the increase did not materialize, we were as much disappointed as the expectant carriers. I take this, the first opportunity which is afforded, to ask the House to keep faith with the betrayed carriers of the country.

Now I am heedful of the caution of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations about the condition of the Treasury; but last year, when the Treasury was fairly bulging, when you had a surplus of $90,000,000 and the nation was the richest in its history, and abundantly able to do so, you did not carry out the provision of law that you had enacted; you do not keep faith with this class of employees, which is the most useful, industrious, and faithful in the Government service. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, my amendment calls for an appropriation of $592,500 and prescribes that the promotions shall be made and how they shall be made. The bill drawn last year was a mere makeshift. I contend that it was not honestly drawn and not reported in an honest spirit to this House, and that we voted for it under a misapprehension. Mr. Chairman, we thought we were going to increase these salaries, but as I said though we thought so, we did not, through no fault of our own. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELIHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman propose now to increase the salaries in only 50 per cent of the cases, instead of joining the gentleman from Ohio, who increases them all?

Mr. KELIHER. Because I do not want the House to declare that, owing to the present depleted condition of the Treasury, it would be inadvisable to extend its provisions to the 11,200 men now in the $1,100 grade. This grade at present is the limit. If you do not take care of them now, the time will come when this grade will become so choked by the mandatory promotions from the lower grades that we will be unable to get the stupendous appropriation that will be required to care for all those eligible for advancement, therefore I believe that half a loaf at this time is better than none.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman thinks we have made a promise, why does he not keep to the whole promise?

Mr. KELIHER. If the gentleman, who is all-powerful in this House, will join with me in support of the measure, I shall be willing to withdraw my substitute and follow him in the attempt to provide for all. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] has already proposed an amendment.

Mr. KELIHER. Yes; but notice has been served from the Republican side of the House upon the gentleman from Ohio (it was served yesterday) that he could not expect it. Now, I want to say if they will give us half a loaf it will be better than none. If not, I shall offer an amendment which will provide for an increase of 25 per cent of them and see whether you intend to keep faith and keep certain promises that you made to the carriers last year. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman himself does not propose to keep faith. He only proposes to keep half faith. The gentleman from Ohio, at least, proposes to keep faith.

Mr. KELIHER. I am attempting to breathe a little life into a dead statute; that is what I am going to do, and I feel that I can do it. You on the other side put a statute on the books and then strangled it. You created the $1,200 class and then starved it to death by not providing an appropriation to sustain it. [Applause.] You pass my amendment to-day and promote 50 per cent next year, and if the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will follow me with a raise of 50 per cent more, that will accomplish all that we hope to accomplish, and there will be satisfaction on the part of the carriers of the country. But you played politics and you have not made good, and I propose to-day to restate it, as my honest opinion, that when Members of this House and members of the coordinate branch reached their homes last spring they told the carriers that they had been provided for; but they have not got the money, and there is not one $1,200 carrier in this country, although there is upon the statute book a law providing a $1,200 class. There is not one $1,200 carrier in all America, and I will withdraw my amendment if the distinguished chairman of the committee will state that I have erred in that statement. [Applause.]

Further on in the act of last year, the one that teemed with deceptions, you provided that clerks and carriers of the highest grade in their respective offices were eligible for promotion to the higher positions in said post-offices. You held out the hope to the carriers of the country that they might by fidelity and efficiency aspire to higher offices in the post-office service. Then you built an insurmountable barrier to that ambition by preventing them reaching the highest grade under the law, from which they were to be advanced. What was the meaning of that? This was more than an ordinary mistake. There was deliberation; there was careful study in the wording of that bill! The demand from the country was so great that you had to give heed to it.

When you did, you did not do so honestly. You created the office and you provided for the increase that public sentiment demanded, and then you prescribed that the prospective beneficiary should rise grade by grade to the $1,100 class, but when that grade was reached, you stopped him. You choked his advance. There was lamentable lack of faith in that action. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is apprehensive lest I am not doing what I should do for this class of carriers.

If he will join me in a movement, all powerful that he is in this body, to provide for all the carriers that are eligible, I will willingly and gladly withdraw my amendment and support the one offered by the gentleman from Ohio. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. I should like to recite a little history of the last Congress. In the first place, this particular classification feature was not reported from this House at all in the shape in which it now appears, but was agreed upon as a compromise between the House and Senate in conference. I am not going to let any temporary exasperation that I may feel or ought to feel toward the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, because of the rather brusque reply he made to me a while ago, make me do him any injustice. I want to say that he and his fellows in that conference did more for the carriers last year than had been done, so far as I have been able to find out, in the forty years preceding. I am going to do him the further justice of assuming that when he agreed to that $1,200 grade he meant, so far as he could, in normal times, to follow that up with an appropriation sufficient to send the carriers to the $1,200 grade. The position he takes is that this is not a normal year. Now, I want briefly to disagree with him to this extent: The fiscal year to which this appropriation will apply will not commence until the 1st of July.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. RYAN. Does the gentleman believe that when this law was enacted last year it was seriously intended to allow the carriers $1,200 this year?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I do not quite understand my colleague's question, but I will state my belief.

Mr. RYAN. I want to put my question plainly, so I will not be misunderstood, because I want to follow it up with another question. I want to ask the gentleman, does he believe it was seriously intended that on the 30th of June, 1908, the carriers in the fifth or $1,100 grade should be promoted to the sixth grade and receive $1,200 a year?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I believe it was seriously intended that every $1,100 carrier should get $1,200 beginning on the 30th of June, 1908.

Mr. RYAN. That is the sixth grade. Now, then, I would like to ask, further, why was it that this language was contained in that very paragraph, "that clerks and carriers at first-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fifth grade, carrying $1,100," and nothing said about the sixth grade, carrying $1,200?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Because, frankly replying to my colleague, I will say that legislation is a compromise. There were other demands upon the country. The automatic promotion scheme of carriers had never before gone above $1,000. We were able by proper argument to show to the conferees that justice demanded that it ought automatically to go to $1,100 and that the House ought to have the right to put it up to $1,200.

Now, I want to say to the chairman of the Post-Office Committee that I realize his great responsibility and the great responsibilities of his committee. I sympathize with their frame of mind when they drew up the bill. But, if you take the city of New York as an index—and everybody on the floor has said that the recent financial panic has struck us harder than anywhere else, everybody getting up and saying that no bank closed in his district—if you take us as an index of the worst, we will not have any trouble after this fiscal year, because while the postal receipts fell off 6 per cent in January, they only fell off 3 per cent in February and are falling off less in March than they did in January, February, and March of the corresponding months last year. So when it comes to the 1st of July we are going to have a normal year, and I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana and his colleagues on the committee, believing that it was his intention and the intention of the conferees that if the succeeding financial year was a normal year the carriers would go from $1,100 to $1,200. Now, this is going to be a normal year, and I ask them to come up to the times. I will concede that the committee had a right to be pessimistic at the time they drew the bill, but now we are to be all right, and they ought to come up to it.

Mr. KELIHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will.

Mr. KELIHER. Is it not a fact that the condition of the country was more prosperous than it ever was before in its history when we voted the amendment, which we expected was a live one and not a dead one?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman from Massachusetts is as competent to judge of history as I am.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Why does the gentleman from New York appeal to the chairman of the committee instead of to the House to pass his amendment?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Well, I will appeal to both; but I have found in my brief experience that if you have the committee with you it is easier to get the amendment through. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate is exhausted except by unanimous consent.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak a moment or two in connection with this matter. I think we all consider the question of the pay of clerks and the pay of carriers in the post-office on a wrong basis. The Post-Office Committee, in my opinion, considers this great appropriation bill from a wrong basis. It is the only appropriation bill where we feel hurt if we do not make a profit on the business we do. We are striving, perhaps properly, to reduce the annual deficit so as to show that the postal business of the country is running at a profit. That is not what the postal business should be run for. It should be run, as all of the other great Departments are, for the protection and, in the case of the postal service, for the convenience of the inhabitants of this country.

The difficulty about it is that we have foisted on the Post-Office Department an enormous item of expenditure that should be charged against the other Departments. The carrying of mail and merchandise for all the Departments should not be charged against the post-office appropriation, but there should be some system of bookkeeping so that the charge for transportation of the mails for the War Department should be charged to it and should be taken from that appropriation and not from the post-office appropriation. It seems to me that a statement of these facts carries belief that the principle is wrong, and then it ciphers itself down to the fact that we make the people least able to afford it pay for the expenses of the transportation of all the mail for all the Departments of the United States.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can give any idea of the cost of the franking privilege for the various Departments?

Mr. OLCOTT. I have not the slightest idea. I have attempted to obtain that information, but I have never been able to find that any record was taken.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman spoke of it, and I thought perhaps he had the figures.

Mr. OLCOTT. I am only speaking of it with the knowledge that I as anyone else must have of mail matter from this House alone, to say nothing of the Departments.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman give us any information as to the value of the franking privilege to a Member of Congress?

Mr. OLCOTT. I can not. I can tell the gentleman how many letters a day I write on Congressional business.

Mr. MANN. The value of the franking privilege, I said.

Mr. OLCOTT. I usually consider that when I write a letter on official business the country is benefited to the extent of the 2-cent stamp, or I would not have written the letter.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that probably he does not write a letter, but that he sends out two or three documents with it.

Mr. OLCOTT. Oh, I generally try to find documents that emanate from the gentleman from Illinois, and I know that they are worth all that they cost.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they may be worth it to the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. OLCOTT. They are worth it to the constituents, because they get such good gospel from the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman who talks about what the franking privilege is worth to the Government would find that the Members of the House might give some testimony on the subject. The gentleman probably keeps some kind of an idea in his head as to what his franking privilege is worth, and other Members do. Why can not the Members of the House dispose of the franking privilege which is worth so much to them?

Mr. OLCOTT. I think the gentleman is departing from the argument. It is not only of the comparatively small amount of money expended for transporting the mail or documents of the House of Representatives or the Senate, but of the entire departmental system of charging everything up against the Post-Office, that I speak, and I merely wanted to follow up my own idea.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York, as a matter strictly for information, how charging up the business to the War Department and the franking expenses to somebody else will in the end help the Government out of the hole?

Mr. OLCOTT. I do not think it will.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All that would do on the face of the earth, then, would be to make the Post-Office Department make a better showing in bookkeeping as to its balance.

Mr. OLCOTT. And so make it impossible for the excuse to be offered that we are spending too much money.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman would be spending just as much money the other way.

Mr. OLCOTT. If we charged it to the other Departments, where it belongs, then when we are discussing the post-office appropriations we would not hear of the deficit and we might do justice to these carriers and clerks.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But the Military Committee or some other committee would get the larruping the gentleman is getting now.

Mr. OLCOTT. Well, I hope it would not hurt them any more than it does me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Now, speaking of the Postal Department as a business proposition, the gentleman says that the franking privilege is a burden on it, because it must pay for all the mail that is sent out from all the Departments and by Congressmen. It is also true, is it not, that many of the buildings used by the Post-Office Department are paid for by the Treasury of the United States, and does not that much more than make up or offset the loss suffered by the Post-Office Department for the franking privilege?

Mr. OLCOTT. Possibly. I never considered that. I had not considered the item of permanent improvements to be of a similar character to that of annual expenditures.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Most of those offices are kept up by the Treasury Department, are they not—the repairs and cleaning and furniture, etc., and the Post-Office Department is free of all that expense?

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yet it does not pay expenses.

Mr. OLCOTT. It does not pay expenses; that is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope to have an opportunity to vote, first, upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, which I favor, and if that does not carry, then to vote upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is designed to carry out the existing law. Everyone is familiar with what occurred at the last session of Congress. The general provision was made for the increase in compensation of postal employees, both rural and city. It is a somewhat significant fact that the rural employees have received the highest salary provided in the law enacted last year, while it is intended that the city employees in the Post-Office Department shall not receive the highest compensation provided.

I have no sympathy with the suggestion that that may be due to the fact that a majority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads come from the rural districts, although it is a somewhat peculiar coincidence. I do not criticise the Committee on Post-Offices for what is about to happen or what has happened. I criticise and charge that the Republican party, the majority in control of Congress, will be and is responsible for the failure to appropriate the money to enable the increases provided by law to be made. The majority can not shirk that responsibility. It is said that the increases will not be made because the revenues are falling off. There is an available cash balance in the Treasury to-day of $266,000,000, although the revenues are falling off and there is a large deficit threatened in this fiscal year. Yet that does not deter those in control of the legislative branch of the Government from not only proposing, but actually providing, increases of pay in a number of other branches of the public service, increases of pay in the Army, increases of pay in the Navy, not for the enlisted men alone, but for the officers, increases of pay in the Revenue-Cutter Service, if I be not mistaken, and also in the Life-Saving Service. So that, Mr. Chairman, these increases which are proposed, not now authorized by law, but entirely new, should not be at all seriously considered, if there is any force in the argument that is urged against the appropriation to carry out the law as it now exists.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman, Mr.

Chairman, whether he regards it a sufficient answer to the country to say that the absence of normal conditions, the falling off of the revenue, etc., is sufficient for the Government not to keep faith, or this Congress not to keep faith with the employees; when it has distinctly stated in last year's law that certain things be done? I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the condition of the country was such that it would be ill-advised to make the appropriation I would not favor it; but that is not the condition. While there will be a large deficit for the present fiscal year, and, from the present indications, in my judgment, for the next fiscal year, the fact is that there is an available cash balance in the Treasury to-day of over $266,000,000, which will be ample to provide for this increase, as it will be ample to provide for the proposed increase in compensation in the other branches of the public service.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Has not the gentleman heretofore in his campaign speeches accused the Republican party of extravagance in the administration of public affairs?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, and I will do it this campaign, and prove it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. And the gentleman will do it again, will he not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said I would prove it in this campaign.

Mr. DRISCOLL. He is trying to make out a case of extravagance in order to hurl it at us next fall.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman's party took credit for increasing the compensation of the postal employees, and they boasted of it. They went about the country boasting of it. They did not do what they pretended. They are not going to do it now, as these amendments provide, and it would not be any extravagance, I will say to my colleague, for him to assist the carriers in his city, who are now getting $1,100 a year, to obtain the $1,200 they are entitled to under the law. Nobody will criticise him in the campaign if he does that, but they will if he fails to do it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL]:

Provided, That of the amount herein provided not less than the sum of $1,185,000 shall be expended for increasing the salaries of the carriers in the city delivery service who shall be promoted after June 30, 1908, from the fifth to the sixth grade, in a manner to be prescribed by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. GOEBEL. I understand the gentleman proposes to add that to my amendment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, to simply add it to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL], so as to obviate the question as to whether or not——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment the following:

"Provided, That of the amount herein provided not less than the sum of $1,185,000 shall be expended for increasing the salaries of the carriers in the city delivery service who shall be promoted after June 30, 1908, from the fifth to the sixth grade, in a manner to be prescribed by the Postmaster-General."

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. What has become of the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have reserved the point of order on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offered a substitute in order to perfect the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GOEBEL. Has the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts been withdrawn temporarily?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, the object is very clearly understood. I have no doubt the gentleman from Indiana and other members of the committee think that any question is obviated as to the increase in the appropriation. I doubt whether the appropriation would be available for the purpose intended without some such provision, and it seems to be generally conceded that the faith of the House was to some extent pledged to this increase.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would like first to dispose of the point of order which has been reserved by me against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the one just offered by the gentleman from Ohio. I insist upon both points of order; and the reason that I regard them as subject to the point of order is that they change existing law. The so-called "classification act" passed last year prescribed the method of promotion from one grade to another, the two chief limitations of which were a year's service in the next lower grade and an efficiency record. Both amendments now before the committee undertake to direct, without regard to these limitations, that these men shall be promoted, and, in addition to that, emphasize that it shall be as the Postmaster-General may prescribe. No such authority of law, to my knowledge, has gone upon the statute books. I insist upon the point of order against each of these amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. KELIHER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio and my amendment are identical, simply as a limitation upon the manner in which that money shall be expended. They carry out the intent of the law, the spirit of the law, written into the statute of last year. They are almost identical. It is a limitation on the manner in which that money shall be expended, and purely a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule first upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. The first clause of Rule XXI reads as follows:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

Frequently such provisions do go through on general appropriation bills, no point of order being made against them. But when the point is made it must, of course, be passed upon.

It seems to the Chair that this provision is not a limitation upon an appropriation, but is a limitation upon the discretion or power of the Post-Office Department; that it is affirmative law. It is not in the negative form, providing that no part of the appropriation shall be expended for a certain purpose or except for a certain purpose. It commands the purpose for which it shall be expended, and in that respect proposes to make affirmative law. It changes existing law. The Chair therefore must sustain the point of order. The same ruling, of course, applies to the point made against the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I now move that all debate close on the paragraph and pending amendments in seven minutes, and I request that I may proceed for seven minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask the gentleman not to put the limitation upon amendments.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I know the gentleman desires to offer some amendment as to substitutes. I have no objection to have it understood that he may offer such an amendment as to substitutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to have a few minutes of debate upon that, and if the gentleman's present motion should prevail that would cut off debate.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman may have an opportunity to offer an amendment affecting substitutes. I now move to close debate on the paragraph and pending amendments thereto, except the amendment relative to substitutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the gentleman from Indiana moves that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto, except an amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, be closed in seven minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the gentleman from Indiana being recognized by the Chair, asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for seven minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the solicitude of Members in whose districts reside a large number of carriers of the $1,100 grade, in their desire to have those carriers advanced to the $1,200 grade. I stated yesterday that I have a number of such carriers in my own district. Personally, I should be much pleased that these men might receive increased salaries. My opposition to this amendment is not directed because I do not believe in the increase of salaries, but it is directed to this particular bill now under consideration, the conditions under which that bill has been prepared, and to the further fact that this is the first session following the session when Congress made such liberal appropriations for the increase of salaries of the postal employees.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER], who offered the amendment, inveighed against the honesty of the classification act and charged deceit and subterfuge in its preparation and enactment. I may say that, with one exception, it is in the identical language recommended by the First Assistant Postmaster-General and urged so strenuously from that Department. That single difference is that under the original bill recommended by Mr. Hitchcock the arbitrary promotion of carriers halted at the $1,000 grade, and the conference committee, acting after the amendment of the Senate upon the bill, increased it to the $1,100 grade as the final point of stopping the arbitrary promotions. So that, if anything, the action of the conference committee was even more liberal in its provision for the arbitrary promotion than the provision carried in the original bill recommended by the First Assistant Postmaster-General. Now, this amendment seeks to increase all of the carriers of the $1,100 grade. The $1,100 grade of carriers have now over eleven thousand out of the total number. Last year there was not a carrier in the $1,100 grade, because prior to the classification act there was no carrier receiving in excess of $1,000 a year.

And Congress, by the provision of the classification act, created two grades of carriers, $1,100 and $1,200, and promoted all of the carriers of the $1,000 grade into the $1,100 grade, provided they had served a year in the $1,000 grade and had a proper efficiency record. Mr. Hitchcock in his testimony last year specifically stated to the committee that he was not recommending that these upper grades be filled at once, and he said:

All I ask as to the $1,200 grade is that it be authorized, and leave to Congress the determination of when and how many carriers shall be advanced into that grade.

Instead of there being the practice of deceit or subterfuge, the provision was made with eyes open, not only of the committee of conference, but the First Assistant Postmaster-General himself. We promoted the $1,000 men to $1,100 last year. In deciding not to promote those men this year we are simply following the policy which I have announced repeatedly in the past two days, of not making provision for increases of salaries this year.

Mr. SULZER rose.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I prefer not to be interrupted, because I have so little time.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman state that appropriation will be made for the $1,200 grade next year?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I should be glad to yield if the time were longer. I mean no discourtesy to the gentleman. We have provided in this very paragraph an appropriation of sufficient money to pay the full salary of every carrier in the service on the 1st day of next July at the salary he is then receiving. In addition to that, the committee provides for 1,500 additional carriers, to be appointed at the lowest grades, and then it provides for $1,297,900 for promotion purposes of the carriers in the grades from $600 to $1,100. Hence every carrier in first-class offices below the $1,100 grade will get a promotion, provided he has served a year in the next lower grade and has a proper efficiency record, under the automatic provision of the classification act.

By withholding the appropriation from the $1,100 grade we have neither violated the provisions of the law nor the intent of its framers. Neither have we violated the intent of the author of that law, Mr. Frank Hitchcock, the First Assistant Postmaster-General. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I can see no occasion for gentlemen becoming so exercised, nor for leaving the impression that they are badly abused, or that we are not making ample and adequate provision for the service. I sincerely hope that the amendment will be voted down. It is 40 per cent greater than was recommended by the Department. Last year we only promoted 50 per cent of the $1,100 clerks. This year we are only promoting 15 per cent of the $1,100 clerks. If you are going to promote according to the real merits, the ability and intelligence required for the performance of the service, we ought to promote the clerks of the $1,100 grade and not the carriers. The $1,100 grade of clerks requires a higher class of service than that which is performed by the $1,100 carrier; but on yesterday we refused an increased appropriation for the salaries of the $1,100 clerks. Having done that the promotion of all the carriers of the $1,100 grade is wholly unjustifiable, and I hope the committee will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL]. I ask for a vote.

Mr. GOEBEL. What is the status now, so that we may understand the situation?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, the substitute having gone out on a point of order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let us have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOEBEL) there were—yeas 45, nays 43.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered. The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. GOEBEL and Mr. OVERSTREET.

The committee again divided and the tellers reported that there were—yeas 70, nays 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 23, after the word "dollars," insert "Provided, That when substitutes for carriers absent without pay are employed on Sundays and holidays, they shall be paid for double time."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is quite simple. At present substitutes for carriers absent without pay are paid 30 cents an hour. As is well known, service on Sundays and holidays is always considered as unusual service and paid for at extraordinary rates. Very frequently a number of substitutes are compelled to take the places of regular carriers who are absent and from whose compensation a full day's pay is deducted. These substitute carriers frequently are compelled to work two or three hours on Sunday or holidays, owing to the conditions that exist in the large cities; while the substitute may work two or three hours, the time actually taken will be four or five hours. Under the law at present, if a substitute works upon Sunday or a holiday for two hours, he is paid 60 cents, and he may be occupied three hours or three hours and a half. If he is employed three hours, he is paid 90 cents. Take the Christmas holiday time, when mail matter is very heavy; the substitute may be employed four hours in actually delivering the mail from the time he reports to his office until he completes his delivery, and for the four hours' work, although the time actually employed by him may be five or six hours, he receives $1.20, while the man whose place he takes has eight hours' pay deducted from his compensation.

In view of the fact that it is everywhere recognized that service upon Sundays and holidays is of an unusual and extraordinary character, and additional compensation, paid therefor, I trust that the gentleman from Indiana will permit this amendment to be adopted. It will not add much to the cost of the public service, but it will enable these men to earn a comparatively reasonable compensation for this work of an extraordinary character. There is not much more to be said. The conditions under which substitutes are employed in the large cities are well known. They may serve a period of two, three, or four years as substitutes before they obtain regular appointments. During that time they are paid at the rate of 30 cents an hour when actually employed. It is impossible for them to accept other employment, because they do not know when they may be called upon for service. After the apprenticeship of three or four years they get a regular appointment at a very meager salary. I trust the chairman will not press his point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to make the point of order. The law fixes the amount of compensation, and this is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard upon his point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, Mr. Chairman; it is clearly subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers, substitute, and auxiliary letter carriers at new offices entitled to city delivery service under existing law, $75,000.

Mr. HAGGOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend after line 5, page 15, by adding the following:

"Whenever a postmaster certifies to the Department that owing to unusual conditions in his community he is unable to procure the services of efficient employees at the initial salary provided for post-office clerks and letter carriers, the Department may authorize in its discretion the appointment of clerks and letter carriers for that office at such higher rate of compensation within the grades prescribed by law as may be necessary in order to insure a proper conduct of the postal business."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. HAGGOTT. Mr. Chairman, in many localities of the Rocky Mountains and Pacific States and Territories the cost of living is very much greater than prevails generally elsewhere and wages in the usual employments are almost double what obtains in the States to the east. This condition prevails particularly in the mining camps.

The amendment which I have just offered was suggested by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, Hon. F. H. Hitchcock, in his report to the Postmaster-General for the year ending June 30, 1907. If this amendment is adopted it will permit the Postmaster-General to pay adequate wages to post-office employees where unusual conditions exist. By existing law the Postmaster-General can not exercise the necessary discretion in paying proper salaries where the expense of living is unusually great and wages in all other occupations are higher than usually prevails.

In many of our Western towns the postmasters must pay out a great part of their salaries for clerk hire in order to secure competent help. This is done in my own town, a mining camp, and is the usual condition in all Western mining communities.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is clearly subject to a point of order, as it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is very clear. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General: For inland transportation by star routes, including temporary service to newly established offices, $7,200,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for continuance of any star-route service the patronage of which shall be served by the extension of rural delivery service, nor shall any of said sum be expended for the establishment of new star-route service for a patronage which is already served by rural delivery service: Provided, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations, in such manner as he may think advisable without advertising therefor.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16 amend by adding at the end of line 14 the words: "Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used to pay for the carrying in the mails any malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors, or intoxicating liquor of any kind."

Mr. OVERSTREET. On that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, in submitting this amendment, which I believe to be in order and not subject to the point of order made against it, I want to state that it is in line and in keeping with an amendment that I had offered to the section of the criminal code providing what should be mailable and nonmailable matter and prohibiting the transportation of certain articles through the mails. If I knew I could have an opportunity to offer that amendment to that section in the penal code I would not offer it now, because I should much prefer to legislate in a different way than that of putting clauses in an appropriation bill. If, however, we shall not get that bill before this House again, then it will be necessary to make this provision after the manner that has been in vogue heretofore—that is, by inserting clauses in appropriation bills, to make limitations and restrictions upon different branches of the public service, and even creating penal offenses this way. As a member of the House Committee on Revision of the Laws, when we were considering the bill that was reported to this House two years ago, when we got to the section of that bill declaring what should be mailable and what should be nonmailable matter I offered an amendment similar to the one I offer here, only it was more comprehensive, inasmuch as it was a part of a penal section in a criminal statute.

When that provision was not adopted by the House committee I gave notice that I would offer the amendment upon the floor of this House; and again, Mr. Chairman, when the joint committee composed of Members of the House and Senate were considering this measure in November last, I offered the same amendment to this section. When this amendment did not prevail there, I again gave notice that I would offer this amendment upon the floor of the House. That, Mr. Chairman, I expected to do until it now appears from the course of events that I may not have an opportunity to offer that amendment to the bill reported by the committee. The committee reported the bill with full knowledge of the fact and with the understanding that this amendment would be submitted by me to the House for its determination, as other amendments would be to other sections to which a number of us did not agree.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that under the bill as reported, without the amendment which the gentleman intended to offer when we reached the proper section, dealing with nonmailable matter, if passed without amendment, intoxicating liquors would not only be mailable, but that the Postmaster-General would, in the provisions, have to provide rules and regulations by which they could be mailed?

Mr. HOUSTON. I think, Mr. Chairman, that is a matter of some doubt. However, I am of opinion that it would have been mailable matter. There was some difference of opinion on that proposition, and in order to settle this question beyond a doubt I offered a positive amendment, so that we would not have anything uncertain in regard to it.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that Congress should legislate on this question. I want to say right here that as the law now stands it is a matter of some doubt as to whether or not alcoholic liquor is mailable matter, and this is the very situation that I want to relieve. I am opposed to leaving any statute in such an ambiguous condition that it is susceptible of any uncertain construction. I am opposed to leaving to departmental bureaus or officials the power to say what the law is in any case. Hence I favored in committees, as I do now, a positive declaration by Congress of what should be mailable matter—so definite and plain that no question could be made as to its meaning.

It is insisted by lawyers that under the law as it now stands it is mailable matter, and that the Post-Office Department has no right to refuse to ship within certain limits whisky or alcoholic liquors through the mails. That, however, is a question upon which there is a great deal of difference. The Department puts a different construction upon it, and it has done so for years, and refused to ship liquors through the mails because of the construction that they give to existing law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I very much hope that there will be an opportunity to engraft that amendment in the penal code, and I hope that penal code may be perfected and finished, but if it shall fail it is very important that this provision be engrafted on this appropriation bill. And without arguing at present the point of order which has been reserved upon this amendment, I merely desire to say I have considered this very carefully, and I do not believe it is subject to the point of order. I will only call attention to the fact that this is simply a limitation upon this appropriation, limiting it to certain purposes, and I think for that reason is not subject to the point of order. But, Mr. Chairman, this brings me to consider and to make reference here to another bill very much akin to this that I hoped I would have an opportunity to vote for in the Fifty-ninth Congress and failing in that one then in this Congress, but I have not had that opportunity. I refer to the bill regulating the shipment of liquors from one State into another; the bill providing that when liquor is shipped from one State into another it shall be subject to the laws of that State. This bill has been known under different names in the past in different Congresses. When I was a candidate for Congress four years ago the question was often asked the candidates in the State I come from, How do you stand as to the "Hepburn-Dolliver bill?" as it was called then.

I favored that bill, and I announced to my constituents that I would support it. I hoped I would have the opportunity, and I believed then, when I had not seen so much of the proceedings of this House as I have since, that I would have the opportunity to vote for that measure. But for three years that opportunity has been denied. There are a number of men on the floor of this House that want to support that measure, that are in favor of it, that have expressed the hope that they might have an opportunity to vote for that bill. No such opportunity has yet been given them. I believe that we ought to have an opportunity in this House to vote upon it. I furthermore believe if the opportunity was ever presented in this House that that bill would pass and become a law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my colleague have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for five minutes. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. As to the amendment, this merely proposes that no money shall be paid out of this appropriation for this star-route service for the transmission of alcoholic liquors through the mails. I have three other amendments of a similar character, applying to the different branches of the mail service, one to the railway mail service, one to the steamship service, and one to the foreign service. They are all very much the same thing, only they apply to different parts of the service. Now, then, as I said, this provides that liquor can not be shipped through the mails, in that it puts a limitation upon the funds appropriated in this appropriation bill to the extent that they shall not be applied in compensation for this kind of mail service, and, as such, I do not think the amendment is subject to the point of order. This amendment will make it definite, at least, during the time that this appropriation bill shall cover that liquors can not be transported through the mails of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This amendment emphasizes the necessity for enacting a law giving to the States a right to control whisky when shipped within its borders from another State. The sentiment of this nation, to my mind, demands the passage of this law. If I am not mistaken in that, it is the duty of the people's Representatives to respond to that demand. They have a right that their views shall be heard and enacted into law. There can be no justification in a course of procedure in this House that will deny to them this right.

If the rules of this House are so manipulated as to defeat this measure in defiance of the American people, a sad day has come for our institutions.

Many States in this Union have taken advanced ground in the way of temperance legislation and great good has been accomplished. Yet their power for good is crippled by the fact that it is beyond the power of the State to control liquors shipped from beyond the State line. I know there is much opposition to all temperance legislation. Those that oppose this legislation grow eloquent in advocacy of personal freedom and individual liberty. Many Democrats in the past have approved this doctrine. Many of them have changed their views and are now most earnest in advocating laws that will prevent the traffic and diminish the use of liquor.

My own State has made great progress in the suppression of the liquor traffic. We have had there temperance legislation that, judged by its result, is among the wisest and best of any State in the Union. What is there known as "The 4-mile law," first intended to have a very limited scope, carried with it more power for good than its framers realized. This scope has been enlarged from time to time, until it now embraces the entire State, with the exception of three or four cities. We have had an object lesson that has convinced our people that it is best for our welfare, material and moral. Lawlessness has been reduced, our criminal dockets greatly cut down. We have seen desolate homes built up and thrift and happiness preside where want and suffering once existed; we have seen weak men built up and made strong in intellectual and moral force.

The opponents of these measures insist that you can not enforce laws to prevent the sale and use of whisky. This argument is as applicable to every statute for the preservation of law and order and for the protection of mankind.

Right here in the capital of the nation it is impossible to enforce laws against robbery and highway assaults so as to prevent them, as is shown by their frequent occurrence; yet I take it that no man would favor an abrogation of the laws against robbery and larceny for this reason. When the American people shall surrender to this doctrine that you can not enforce a wholesome law, then they are ready to surrender their manhood as a civilized and progressive nation. The spirit that supported and sustained our ancestors in carving out this Republic, in establishing law and authority over all opposition, is abandoned when we say we can not enforce a law that the enlightened conscience of the nation says is right.

I know the laws upon this subject have been and will be evaded and circumvented, as all laws are to some extent; but I do know, as every man of common reason knows, that the farther you put whisky away from a man or a community and the more difficult you make it to get, the less of it will be used by that man or that community. No argument can refute this. I believe that the American people can enforce any law when they are alive to its importance and realize that it is best for the welfare and happiness of the people. When we realize, as we are doing more and more fully every day, that "we are our brother's keeper" and that men should "as brothers be o'er all the world," then we can enforce this law.

You hear it said that we have periodical revivals of this temperance craze; that the pendulum is swinging forward in the temperance movement, but will swing back when the excitement of the period passes; that the present temper of the public mind is temporary—not so. The pendulum has not swung backward. It is advancing year by year, gathering force steadily, sometimes checked for a time, but renewed each time with redoubled force, gathering fresh power and vigor with each succeeding onrush, and as civilization proceeds and religion triumphs it will progress.

It is well to develop individual virtue and character as the strongest reliance for safety for nations as for men, but in developing this character I believe in the benefit of healthy and wholesome environments. We are the creatures of influence, more or less, and we do know that "evil communications corrupt good manners," and an ever-present temptation is more than most men can resist. I believe in that doctrine and that spirit that prays lead us not into temptation and that asks to be delivered from evil.

This prayer should be supported by a live faith that will work for what it prays and will use every effort to remove this evil as far away as possible, and every vote that I shall cast shall be to that end.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think not. If I heard the amendment correctly, I think it undoubtedly not only changes existing law, but makes new law.

The gentleman who offered the amendment conceded that he had sought to incorporate it in the criminal code; and if it is not in the law now, and he is seeking to put it in this law, that would be a change of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is—

That no part of said sum shall be used to pay for carrying in the mails any malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors or intoxicating liquors of any kind.

The gentleman from Tennessee has stated that the law now prohibits the carrying of any such articles in the mails.

Mr. HOUSTON. By a construction of the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. Upon its face the amendment seems to be a straight limitation upon the appropriation. It may be that if the law, as it now stands, authorizes the carrying of liquors in the mails this amendment would in its operation affect the carrying out of existing law. But upon that the Chair can hardly pass. There is nothing upon the face of the amendment which leads to the conclusion that it is anything but a limitation upon the appropriation. It is not necessary, however, to rest a decision upon that ground. The paragraph itself already contains certain provisions important to consider. The first proviso is:

That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for continuance of any star-route service the patronage of which shall be served by the extension of rural-delivery service; nor shall any of said sum be expended for the establishment of new star-route service for a patronage which is already served by rural-delivery service.

They are propositions against which no point of order was made. But then there is in the paragraph this further proviso:

That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations, in such manner as he may think advisable without advertising therefor.

That is clearly a provision changing existing law, left in the bill by unanimous consent we must presume, no point of order having been made against it.

It has often been ruled that a paragraph itself being out of order having been allowed to remain in the bill, it is in order to amend it by any germane amendment, even though the amendment itself might otherwise be out of order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the statement just made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON], together with the statement previously made by his colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], when the penal code was being considered, makes it proper that I should state to the House what action was taken by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws and what is the existing law to-day relative to alcoholic liquors going through the mails. A rather sensational statement was made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] to the effect that he had discovered what he was pleased to term a "nigger in the wood pile," and that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, by a proposed section, known as section 218 of that bill, was proposing to authorize and legalize the shipment through the mails of alcoholic liquors.

Now, unfortunately, this is a subject about which some men are frequently apt to be a little extreme, to say the least. The committee found that there was no law existing to punish persons causing the shipment through the mails of articles dangerous either to the mails or to the persons handling them. For instance, as the law exists to-day, if there is shipped through the mails poisoned candy, there is no provision in the statutes which enables the Government to punish the man shipping it through the mails.

That is a condition which we felt ought to be remedied, and which the Commission when it prepared the work, which was the basis of our committee's work, thought ought to be remedied. The result was that they provided that certain articles should not be shipped through the mails, and then provided a penalty for a disregard of that provision. But they also provided:

That the Postmaster-General shall permit the transmission in the mails, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe as to preparation and packing, of any articles hereinbefore described which are not outwardly and of their own force dangerous and injurious to health, life, or property.

A majority of the members of the committee believed that it should be left to Congress to declare what would be nonmailable matter, and that it was not the privilege of the Department to exercise a discretion as to what should or should not be permitted to go through the mails. The committee did not feel warranted in a revision of the law to provide that alcoholic liquors should be excluded from the mails, that not being existing law, but that Congress could and doubtless would so provide when its attention was called to the matter. In the existing law there is no provision which prohibits the shipment of alcoholic liquors through the mails. I make that statement as the result of a very careful research and as the result of frequent conferences with the Post-Office Department.

The Post-Office Department claims the right to exclude liquors from the mail, but they base that right on a regulation, and when you ask them for the law which is the basis of their regulation they refer you to what is now the existing law, which is in these words:

Mailable matter of the fourth class shall embrace all matter not embraced in the first, second, or third class which is not in its form or nature liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise damage the contents of the mail bag or harm the person of anyone engaged in the postal service and is not above the weight prescribed by law.

Now, it might be tenable to say that no sort of a liquid under that provision could go through the mails, but that is not the position that the Department takes. To-day you can ship—and there are being shipped through the mails, and properly shipped through the mails, in my judgment—inks that are poisonous and, except for the special packing, dangerous both to the contents of the mail bag and the person handling them; mucilage, antitoxins, patent medicines, and all sorts of liquids; but when it comes to alcoholic liquors, then the Department determines that although the same packing could be used as to them as was used as to inks and mucilages, they shall not be allowed to pass through the mails.

Only now, for my part, I have no desire to have the mails used for the shipment of alcoholic liquors, though there is much to be said in favor of the right of a broker engaged in what is yet a legitimate business, and one from which the Government receives a large revenue, to ship samples of liquor through the mails. For my part I have no desire to have that the law. I do desire, however, that Congress itself shall determine that liquors shall not go through the mails, and not that the Department shall make a discrimination which has no basis either in law or in fact. There is no reason why a mucilage or a red ink can go through the mails without damage to the mail bags or to the person handling it and whisky or beer can not, provided they are all packed so that in case of breakage the contents will be absorbed by the wrapping, which is all that is required by the Department in the case of these other things.

Now, the Committee on Revision of the Laws did not change the law, because, in my opinion, a mandamus would lie to compel any postmaster to receive a shipment of alcoholic liquors. They did not change that law at all, but they simply provided for the punishment of people who shipped through the mails articles that are prohibited from being shipped, and then they said that the postmaster shall make regulations as to articles that, by virtue of being packed in certain ways, may be shipped without injury.

At that time the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] offered an amendment excluding liquors from the mails, and it was understood that he would offer on the floor such amendment, and if that bill had continued to be considered by the House he would have offered the amendment, which is similar in purport to the limitation that he has now offered, that alcoholic liquors should not be permitted to go through the mails. The committee on revision believed that by this action of one of its members the matter would properly come before the House for its determination without the committee departing from its generally observed rule of not proposing new legislation touching matters about which there might be division of opinion. It seemed proper, inasmuch as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] had made the charge referred to, that I should make this statement. It is perhaps proper also to add that the print of the bill, coupled with what purported to be existing law, may have misled the gentleman.

Right opposite the new section 218, that was proposed by the committee, two sections were printed which purport to give the existing law, but unfortunately they do not give existing law, because one of those sections is repealed by the other, and while that is known to those who have examined the law, it is, as I have said, what probably misled the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]., Section 3878 of the Revised Statutes, after providing that mailable matter of the third class shall embrace all pamphlets, publications, etc., then has a provision excluding from the mails all liquids, poisons, glass, explosive material, obscene books, etc.; but that section was repealed by section 20 of the act of June 8, 1896, found in the second supplement, page 507, which simply provides, as I have stated, that mailable matter of the fourth class shall embrace all matter not embraced in the first, second, and third class, and so forth.

So that to-day, as the law is, there is no prohibition in terms upon the shipment through the mails of alcoholic liquors. It is for this committee to determine whether they want to create such a prohibition, and inasmuch as the Department is prohibiting the shipments through the mails it would be infinitely better for Congress to clearly pass such a law than to permit this distinction without warrant of law to be made by the Department; in other words, for the Government to cease to be hypocritical and for us to be frank in dealing with the subject.

Now, I think another good purpose may come out of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, and that is the avoidance of the error fallen into by the other branch of Congress when dealing with this subject-matter, for when the penal-code bill was considered in the Senate section 218 was so amended as to exclude from the mails all liquids.

Now, it is manifest that to exclude liquids other than alcoholic liquids would work a very great wrong. For instance, to-day a physician can have sent to him antitoxin and various medicines that are in liquid form to places where the express does not carry packages, and where, but for the facilities afforded by the mail, the packages could not be received. Under the modern system of packing there is no greater danger of carrying liquids than there is of carrying an ordinary package of equal bulk. If we are going to legislate on an appropriation bill in regard to this matter, it is well to bear in mind that in striking at the evil that many people think would follow the use of the mail for shipment of alcoholic liquors we do not also interfere with the shipment through the mails of other liquids that can properly go through the mail without doing damage to anyone.

I have taken occasion to make these remarks for the primary purpose of putting the Revision Committee right. I am satisfied that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], having investigated this matter subsequent to his statement, will be more than glad to say to the House publicly, as he said before publicly, that his statement, in the light of the history of the whole affair, was not warranted.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have an opportunity to state what prompted me to make the statement that I did. I would have made it long ago had it not been that I expected that the same bill would be back here and the section be reached. It became manifest that there was a disposition, from the various votes given on that bill at the time it was being considered, to vote with the committee, and that is perfectly natural. We all do that. I supposed that the committee had considered everything carefully and that in the main they were right. I will trust to the committee any time when I have not investigated the matter. As I stated at that time, I saw a gentleman in the gallery of the House—and when I say gentleman I mean it, because I knew nothing discreditable to him—a gentleman who had been before the District Committee in opposition to temperance legislation. Naturally I supposed there was something in the bill that we were then considering in which the interests he represented were interested, because I knew he was not in the gallery to hear what he was then hearing in a general way.

I began an examination of the criminal-code provision, and first examined the internal-revenue provisions, and I found nothing there that I thought he was interested in. I turned to the provisions of the postal laws. As the gentleman from Kentucky kindly stated, at that time I had seen no report and heard no reference to any except the large printed one which Members were referring to, when discussing the bill, as the report, on the left-hand page of which was printed what purported to be the law as codified, and on the right-hand page the law as it stood without the codification. I read first the law as codified, and then I read the provision on the right hand which provided as nonmailable matter all liquids and the provision which the gentleman from Kentucky referred to making it mandatory on the Postmaster-General to mail the matters therein, provided they were packed in the manner prescribed in the codified law.

Now, it looked to me, not with an ulterior motive, not charging the committee with intending to do something covertly or underhandedly by means of this revision, without it being particularly pointed out, but that it did change existing law in the manner reported; and I did call it a "nigger in the woodpile," meaning that by means of a revision there was made a change of existing law without having it pointed out in the report. With all I had before me then I felt I was fully justified in making the remark that I did, but my purpose was to get gentlemen on the other side, who are in the majority, to examine the section referred before we reached it, and vote upon it from an understanding of what was in the section, and not merely to be regular and stand by their side in the committee. If I had seen the other part of the report, I would not have used the language I did, and I was very glad to know that it was the intention of my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] to offer the amendment which I learned he had offered in the committee and had notified the committee that he would offer it in the House positively excluding intoxicating liquors from the mails, and I have no doubt that when that bill is considered, if it is ever so considered, that amendment will be so offered by him and supported by both the gentlemen from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

But, for fear that bill may not reach us, I hope the House will vote for the amendment of my colleague now. The excluding of alcoholic liquors at present is by regulation of the Department, by departmental law, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is correct in his contention, and with the investigation he has made I will not controvert it. Therefore it is of more importance that we should make it mandatory, because some subsequent Postmaster-General may differ from this one and take off the brakes or change the regulations. Therefore I hope that the committee will vote for the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as an amendment to that offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the amendment the following: "or any cocaine or derivative thereof."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee prevails, it prohibits the transportation of alcoholic liquors by mail. This adds to that the prohibition of cocaine by mail. I take it that if the amendment should prevail——

Mr. SULZER. Why not put in morphine also?

Mr. MANN. It means that in the Senate or in conference the provision will be carefully corrected and put in shape of a more perfect provision of law than could possibly be had by offering it as an amendment on an appropriation bill in the first place, the gentleman being required to so form his amendment so as to keep it in order. Now, while the transportation of liquor by mail in many places is undoubtedly a great detriment to the people, it is true to a much greater extent, probably, that the transportation of cocaine and its derivatives, like alpha and beta eucaine, and heroin, and others, is of much greater detriment. In the investigation concerning the pure-food law we determined, and the House put the provision into the law requiring, that all of those articles should be named either upon medicines or upon foods. It has been called to my attention, growing out of my interest in this matter, that in some places they are circulating advertisements and extensively selling small quantities of cocaine and its derivitives and sending them by mail.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What are the derivatives?

Mr. MANN. Alpha and beta eucaine and heroin and a number of others. They are perfectly well known in the drug business and to the medical profession. There are a great many of them. If there is to be any prohibition in the law of things to save people from becoming slaves to habit, of all things that should be safeguarded are the mails. I was told this morning that in the city of Richmond, right close to us, it was a most common thing to-day to obtain cocaine or some of its derivatives by mail, and that some people, doing business not a hundred miles from Washington, were engaged in advertising these classes of habit-forming drugs, especially in that place. The same is true in a number of other places, and there is a very widespread demand upon the part of the people who have taken notice of that matter that as far as possible the mails shall not be used for the transportation of these habit-forming drugs to people who become slaves of the habit and whose health is ruined by the use of the drug.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman consent to put the word "opium" after the word "cocaine?"

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me a moment I will state that I first wrote the amendment "cocaine, opium, or any of the derivatives," and the question was raised as to whether that would permit the transportation of paregoric or things of that sort in the mails, and while personally I do not think that is a derivative of opium, I think it would be best if we could insert in the bill an item calling attention to this project, to let it be perfected in a way where it could be perfected, when the committee would have a better opportunity of considering it either in the Senate or in conference.

Mr. SULZER. Opium is twice as deleterious to health as cocaine.

Mr. MANN. Well, not so bad as cocaine.

Mr. HOUSTON, Mr. GAINES of Tennessee, and Mr. CRUMPACKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. If I may be permitted, I may say that I am willing to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, just a word or two about these amendments. I am in favor of both, and I hope they may be adopted. The liquor proposition has been thoroughly discussed, and I trust that it will do as I think it will—that is, help the "dry" States, and Tennessee is almost one of them, and even the "wet" States enforce their local laws against intoxicants. We should not send anything through the mails that will interfere with the mail service or that tends to break down the local laws, and especially the police laws of the several States. Now, I happen to personally know that the mail, Mr. Chairman, is being used for the distribution of cocaine and other things with cocaine in them, notwithstanding there are strict local statutes that say it shall not be used unless a physician prescribes it.

All over the United States, in the principal cities, are advertisements sent through the papers to the effect that they will send you so much cocaine, and the cocaine victim will read it, and he will send there for it. He will send a postage stamp, he will send a copper, he will send any kind of money, or any amount of money to get the amount of cocaine that the law of his State or city says he shall not have, and which the doctor prescribes he shall not have. And yet he defeats the law of his State, the prescription of the doctor, by the efforts of these people who send it through the mail. I do hope, Mr. Chairman, that both of these amendments will be adopted.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no objection to either amendment. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question first is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a similar amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16 amend by adding at the end of line 16 the words: "Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used to pay for the carrying in the mails of any malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors or intoxicating liquors of any kind."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, the paragraph not having yet been read, the amendment is not now in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, at the end of line 14 on page 16 I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That rural carriers who are required to carry locked pouches shall be paid out of this fund the sum of $10 per month in addition to their compensation as now fixed by law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon that.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, of course the amendment is clearly subject to the point of order, and it is not necessary to discuss it. I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I very much regret that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] has made the point of order against this amendment. It is clearly subject to the point of order and must therefore go out without giving the House the opportunity to vote upon what I believe to be a meritorious proposition. The maximum pay allowed rural letter carriers is $900 per year. In many instances the rural letter carriers are required to carry lock pouches to supply fourth-class post-offices which they reach. This work results in a large saving in that it prevents the necessity of keeping up the star route at a considerable expense. It does seem fair and just that the rural letter carrier, who has this additional work placed upon him and thus saves the Government a large sum of money, should have some compensation for this extra work. I have offered a very moderate amendment, which provides compensation for this extra service at $10 per month. I know in my own district there are instances in which rural letter carriers carry lock pouches to offices which are the distributing offices for a number of rural routes. I think the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads should permit the amendment to be voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by steamboat, or other power-boat routes, $800,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is the same amendment as the other one, only it provides for the transmission of mail by steamboats. That is the only difference.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly the same language as the amendment that has been adopted?

Mr. HOUSTON. It is the same language without the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but which I should be glad to see added to it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I want to say as to the point of order, while I will make no objection on the merits of this amendment, I want to again address the Chair upon the subject of the point of order, as I did before.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that a provision of law which prohibits the use of any part of an item of appropriation for the carriage of any specific article in the mail would be obnoxious to the rule, unless there was some machinery provided whereby you could ascertain and identify the article which you seek to prohibit. How are you going to tell whether a package which was sealed and paid for at a rate which will not permit the seal of the package to be broken, whether or not it contains any of those articles which you seek to prohibit? Take some cocaine, or even a small vial of liquor, that is incased in a package, which is not broken, upon which a sufficient amount of postage has been paid to guarantee that it shall not be broken. First-class mail can not be broken. How is it to be determined, and when we seek to determine, what officers of the law are called upon to exercise that function? I am not insistent in opposing either one of these amendments upon their merits, but I do not want to fail to call attention of the Chair to the law when it is proposed to put legislation of this character upon a bill of this kind.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that all that the gentleman has said might be said with equal propriety as to a limitation of any character as to any appropriation. I believe it would be better to enact a clause in the penal code to make it a crime and punish it as such to ship liquors through the mails; but when it comes to this case, it is only a limitation, and the same criticism can be made to any limitation of any appropriation whatever that would apply as well to any other limitation or prohibition as it does to this.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Just one further word, Mr. Chairman. When a limitation upon an appropriation is sought to be effected, that limitation must be certain in its purpose and must be reasonable. You can not say because you put words in a phrase that seeks to impose a limitation that you thereby escape a point of order. You might say, "Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used for carrying the mail on any vessel if the master is less than 8 feet in height." That would be a limitation, but it would be a foolish limitation. I undertake to say that the limitation in this amendment is not a reasonable limitation, because it can not be enforced. If this subject was before the House upon its merits, I would very willingly support it; and yet there is not the same justification for this amendment to be applied to this item of appropriation as there was to the former item of appropriation, because the former limitation was to put into law what is now the practice or regulation of the Department, where there is a limitation of the Department on the carrier upon the star routes. He can be directed not to receive packages which in themselves would appear to be packages which it is sought to prohibit.

But when you seek to prohibit by what I think is an unreasonable limitation the use of transportation that is upon steamboats, why that leads into all varieties of boats, large and small, large items of mail that go into the mail transportation, without a proper knowledge and means of ascertaining whether or not any of those prohibited articles are in the mails when carried.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman that practically it would not be possible to carry out the provisions of the amendment in the shape the amendment is offered. But is it not practical, with the amendment in the bill, or another amendment like this going into the bill, to perfect that legislation in the Senate or in conference? Of course, necessarily, an amendment offered like this has got to endeavor to conform to the rules when it is offered. Would it not be practical in the bill, before it becomes law, to have a prohibition which might be effective?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can think of no amendment of the statute that would meet the situation except it should be a universal provision that hereafter no article of such character shall be admitted to the mails at all, anywhere, and fix a penalty. There is no penalty in this amendment offered here.

Mr. MANN. I know; that is just it. The gentleman understands that you have got to have some things put before the House in the way the rules provide. Here is the point of it. This is now in the bill. Is it not possible for the gentleman to work out a proposition of this sort, so that the provision can be changed in the Senate or can be inserted in conference?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think there is no means whatever that would apply to a provision of this character that does not apply to fifteen items of the bill in order to perfect that kind of legislation.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is already something in the bill.

Mr. MANN. The best place for this item, if it is in order there, would be on the item for inland transportation by railroad routes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think so.

Mr. MANN. Of course, that would cover everything.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Of course, that would cover everything.

Mr. MANN. But this amendment might be in order on the item to which it has already been made, and not be in order on the other item.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can not think so.

Mr. MANN. Because the paragraph to which the amendment has already been made was itself subject to a point of order, and hence, as this paragraph is not subject to a point of order, a different question arises. As far as I am concerned, my own judgment would be that this amendment is not in order on this paragraph. I think it is a change of existing law, and yet it is a very close line of authority and decision as to whether this is a mere limitation or a change of law. I take it, in any event, that if it is inserted in the bill the gentleman will endeavor to work it out so that it will be practicable as a legal proposition.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to suggest one thing in the interest of a good and sound parliamentary rule, to be applied in this and all like cases. I am not opposed to this amendment. I think the other amendment that was just adopted was in order, for the reason just stated by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. That is, that it was an amendment to that which was not objected to, but which would have been subject to a point of order if it had been made. One test, and perhaps the proper test, of this modern rule allowing a provision to be in order on an appropriation bill when it is a limitation on the money proposed to be appropriated, is whether the provision or amendment proposed is intended to prevent the use of a part of the money at all, or merely to prevent its use for a certain purpose. If the amendment proposed merely excludes from the mails the things mentioned, it is not a limitation within the rule. If that is the object of it, and that is the thing to be or that will be accomplished, then it is not in order, unless it follows that in excluding those things it saves the money to be appropriated from being expended at all.

If the money is to be expended in a way provided for in the bill, without reference to whether these things are excluded or not excluded, then the rule, as I have understood it hitherto, and I think it is and should be the rule now, would be to treat the amendment as a mere proposition to exclude from the mails the things that are referred to, and not in order for the reason it is not a limitation on the expenditure of the money, because the money is to be expended at all events. That is the way I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and the Post-Roads understands it, and that the amendment is not to save the money. It might well be that when money is proposed to be expended you may say that it is only to be expended for a certain purpose, and then if it is not necessary for that the money shall not be expended at all. Here it is proposed to expend the money, but to tack on a clause that the money is not to be used for certain purposes will only, as in this case, exclude some things from the mail and results only in making a law prohibiting the things named in the amendment from the mails, and not in preventing the money from being expended. Under the guise of such limitations much wholly new legislation can be put in appropriation bills, and the spirit if not the letter of the rule will be violated.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the proposed amendment is in order. It is clearly a limitation, and I thought that question was decided by the Chair in the ruling the Chair made upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee on the paragraph just preceding the one now under consideration. The amendment is a limitation of the appropriation. It provides, as I understand it, that no part of the appropriation shall be used for carrying certain kinds of mail that under the law are mailable. It does not change the law. The effect of it is that Congress refuses to make an appropriation for carrying certain classes of mail that is now admitted under the law. It is generally understood, it is known by every Member of the House, that Congress may appropriate or withhold appropriations for legal purposes. Congress may appropriate for one of a number of legal purposes, and not for others. Now, numerous articles are mailable. Appropriations may be made to carry them all. Congress may provide, however, in connection with the appropriation, that no part of it shall be used to carry one particular line of articles. Does that repeal the law? Does it change the law? No; it is a limitation upon the appropriation. That is all there is to it. It simply expresses the purpose of Congress not to appropriate money to carry certain kinds of matter that it might appropriate money to carry. Congress need not appropriate money to carry anything. It may appropriate money to carry certain classes and not others, and under the rules of the House it can only express that intention in the form of a limitation upon the appropriation itself.

Now the question, Mr. Chairman, of the difficulty that may arise in the administration of the provision is not one that may affect the validity of the amendment. It is not one that can be considered in connection with its admissibility under the rule; that is a matter that addresses itself to the discretion of the House when it comes to act upon the proposed amendment. It may be a foolish amendment, it may be one that it is difficult to administer, but I repeat that that question addresses itself entirely to the good sense of the House when it comes to act on the amendment proposed. I think this amendment is exactly in line with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee a few moments ago, which was upheld by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment, unlike the one upon which the Chair ruled, is offered to a paragraph which is of itself not subject to a point of order. The question, therefore, comes up squarely for decision whether or not this amendment is to be considered as merely a limitation upon the appropriation, or whether it changes existing law.

The Chair listened with great attention to the argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], and if this were entirely a new question, might be inclined to give it more consideration than it now feels at liberty to do. It may be that the operation of this amendment would be difficult. It may be that it would be impossible to carry it into effect without stopping the entire transportation of the mails by inland waters, and yet, if it did, would that take it out of the position of a limitation upon an appropriation? It is within the power of the House to refuse to appropriate at all, which would, of course, stop the transportation entirely. It may be that this is a very unwise amendment, but upon that the Chair can not pass. It may be that the operations of the Department in determining what does go by mail would be so affected as to make it impossible of carrying the mail at all if this amendment were adopted. That is a matter for the House or the committee in its wisdom to determine, and not for the Chair. The Chair must be guided, it seems, by what appears on the face of the amendment, unless some provision of law is shown to be changed by the amendment as offered.

It has been held in several instances that, while it is not in order to legislate as to qualifications of recipients of appropriations, a general appropriation bill may specify that no part of the appropriation shall go to recipients lacking certain qualifications. Again, it has been held that an amendment providing that no part of an appropriation shall go to a Soldiers' Home where a canteen is maintained—involving, of course, an investigation to see whether a canteen was maintained—was a mere limitation upon the appropriation and therefore in order. It was held very recently that, while it is not in order on an appropriation bill to require letters on public vehicles, it is in order to withhold the appropriation from all vehicles not lettered. It has been held in order to provide in an appropriation bill that no part of an appropriation shall be expended in the payment of adjudicated claims until the said claims shall have been certified as finally adjudicated. An amendment that no part of an appropriation for the Army should be available for an army of over a certain size has been held in order as a limitation and not as a change of existing law; so it has been held that a provision that no part of an appropriation for an article should be paid to any trust was in order as a limitation. These precedents would seem to rule the pending case.

In other words, the power of the House to refrain entirely from making an appropriation argues that in making one it has the power to provide that it shall not be used in a certain manner or for a certain purpose. While the Chair would, if this were an original proposition not covered by precedents, think it very close under all the circumstances, the Chair feels constrained to overrule the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I move to amend the amendment by adding at the end thereof "or any cocaine or derivative thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment at the end by adding "or any cocaine or derivative thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, $1,000,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts not exceeding, in the aggregate, $1,388,759, under the provisions of the law, for a period not exceeding ten years: Provided, That said service shall not be extended in any cities other than those in which the service is now under contract under authority of Congress, except the borough of Brooklyn, of the city of New York, and the cities of Baltimore, Md.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Kansas City, Mo.; Pittsburg, Pa., and San Francisco, Cal.: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for any extension of pneumatic-tube service in any city, where by limitation of franchise or ordinance, a special taxation or exaction other than the ordinary taxation upon property generally in such city is imposed; nor where provisions in any franchise or ordinance may require the ultimate ownership of such tube property by such city, except at a reasonable cost.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that proviso beginning on page 16 with the word "Provided" and ending on page 17 with the word "cost."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I did not quite catch what the gentleman from South Carolina said.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against this new legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, reserving a point of order against the paragraph, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the object in doing so.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I presume the gentleman is referring to the last proviso.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. I would first like to state the facts and then call the attention of the gentleman to another situation, which I doubt that the committee had in contemplation at all.

In the first place, this proviso to which I have offered objection, "that no part of the appropriation shall be expended for the extension of pneumatic-tube service in any city where provision of any franchise or ordinance may require the ultimate ownership of such property by such city except at a reasonable cost," applies, I understand, to the city of Chicago.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It applies wherever those conditions exist.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But particularly now to the city of Chicago. In that city the Pneumatic Tube Company has a franchise which runs for a period of twenty years. It has fifteen years yet to run, and the franchise provides that at the end of the twenty years the company shall convey all of its rights and property to the city of Chicago free of cost. The hearings show that the company has attempted to obtain from the common council of the city of Chicago a modification of its franchise, so that when the franchise expires the city shall pay to the company compensation for its property.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me ask the gentleman if this proviso does not apply also to every city that imposes a license tax upon a theater, upon a saloon, or upon a franchise, or any kind of business excepting a general property tax?

Mr. FITZGERALD. So far as it applies to pneumatic tubes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is not limited to pneumatic tubes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is. Outside of the extraordinary attempt on the part of Congress that this would be to coerce the municipality into modifying a franchise, this provision applies with particular force to a situation that may arise in the city of New York. In the city of New York and its several boroughs there is a pneumatic-tube service. The city is building, either with its money or with the city's credit, a great system of subways. It is intended in time to utilize these subways not only for the passage of passenger cars, but to install pneumatic tubes, telephone wires, telegraph wires, and as many other public-service conveniences as can readily be inserted into the subways, and thus prevent the continual digging up of the public streets and the consequent interference with business.

These subways in the city of New York are being built in such a way that the city either owns them now or ultimately will. They are operated by lessees. Under this provision, if it be incorporated into the law, if the pneumatic-tube company in the city of New York obtained a license from the city to build its tubes through the subways, and agreed that at the expiration of a certain number of years the city should own the tubes, then it would be an impossibility for the Post-Office Department to expend any money in a pneumatic-tube service carried in those tubes unless the city modified its agreement and agreed to pay for the rights and privileges and property of the corporation willing to accept a franchise upon the other conditions. I believe this is an indefensible proposition. I know that in the hearings it is asserted that in the city of Chicago, because of this peculiar franchise which this company accepted, I suppose with great eagerness, it is difficult now to obtain money to provide for the extension of the pneumatic-tube service, because the franchise has only fifteen years more to run, and at the end of that time the property will belong to the city of Chicago.

I think it would be a great benefit to the Federal Government to have the municipalities own the pneumatic tubes. Of what use would they be except to permit the Federal Government to utilize them free of cost in order to facilitate the transmission of the mails in the city. I have no doubt that in every city wherein the municipal authorities owned or controlled a great system of pneumatic tubes it would gladly permit the Federal Government to utilize them in order to obtain the additional facilities that would result in the mail service. To incorporate into this bill that if a company willingly accepted a franchise providing that at the end of a certain time it will donate or turn over its property to the city, a condition that under such circumstances no money appropriated for a pneumatic-tube service could be expended in tubes so operated under such franchise, is an outrage upon the great municipalities of the country.

I shall prefer to see the entire provision for the extension of pneumatic-tube service in the great cities of the country, including the city of which I am a resident, eliminated from this bill rather than that the power of the Federal Government should be utilized as a club to coerce municipalities or any portion of their government into rescinding the provision that requires the turning over of such property free, and coerces the municipality into paying for the property at the end of the franchise period. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, unless an agreement can be reached that the last clause of the paragraph can be eliminated, I shall insist upon this point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it looks to me as though the provision as it is printed in the bill would prohibit the expenditure of any of the appropriation for pneumatic-tube service in Chicago. The pneumatic-tube service is now established. I take it, it was the intention of the committee in framing the bill, however, to make this provision only apply to the extension of the pneumatic-tube service.

Mr. GOEBEL. It says so.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. In my judgment, he is mistaken. The first proviso says that "no part of this appropriation shall be expended for any extension of pneumatic-tube service where," and so forth, and then comes the end of that clause and then a semicolon; then "nor where provisions in any franchise or ordinance may require the ultimate ownership of such tube property." I think "nor where" relates back to "no part of this appropriation shall be expended," so that if the provision as it stands in the bill shall become a law, no part of the appropriation could be expended. It is a matter that could be easily fixed by punctuation.

Now, in the city of Chicago a franchise was granted to the Pneumatic Tube Company at the time when it became the settled policy of the city to require a percentage of the gross receipts of any company making use of the streets in any way to be paid into the city treasury. The Pneumatic Tube Company was not excepted from that settled policy of the city. I am personally inclined to think that the city ought not to require a percentage of the gross receipts of a pneumatic tube, devoted wholly to the transportation of mails, to be paid into the city, because probably that means that in order to accommodate the city, and provide for its mail delivery there, the National Treasury shall pay part of the appropriation into the city treasury. But, of course, Congress in its willingness is desirous of contributing something to the city treasury of Chicago. We have not any too much money in our city treasury, and we would be very glad to have the benefit of the National Treasury to help us.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman let me interrupt him?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I wish to say to the gentleman that the United States Government pays the full limit of $17,000 a mile in every city where the service is in operation. So we do not pay any more in Chicago than we do anywhere else.

Mr. MANN. It may be. I was about to say that I did not know whether the full limit was being paid or not. I do not know about that provision as to the extension. My understanding is, however, that in the past it has been impossible to get the company to extend its pneumatic-tube service, because in one way, or to some extent, at least, it was claimed that part of the revenue had to be paid into the city treasury, but it does seem to me that there may be decided objections to that portion of the proviso concerning which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has already spoken, and which would prohibit the franchise or city ordinance from requiring ultimately the property of the tube company coming to the city. I am inclined to think if the city of Chicago or any other city in granting a franchise for the pneumatic tube can ultimately acquire the ownership of the tube, that means the General Government will obtain it in the end free of cost. It is undoubtedly true, I would say, that if the city of Chicago should now become the owner of the pneumatic-tube service there, now devoted wholly to the postal service, the city would have no use for it.

The city has no occasion to make use of the pneumatic-tube service, and it would naturally and willingly turn it over to the General Government if the Government desired to use it. And I can see no reason why the city should not require in its ordinance that ultimately the ownership of the tube should come to the city, and thereby afford the opportunity of having it come to the General Government.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to ask the gentleman a question or two in relation to the service in Chicago. I understand from him that the tube service there is used exclusively in the transmission of mails?

Mr. MANN. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is it capable of use for any other purpose than the transmission of mails?

Mr. MANN. It would be capable of other use undoubtedly to a certain extent if the mails were not transported in it, but I think it is not capable of transporting the mail and other packages besides.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would not be practical, then, to use it for the transmission of private matter and mail at the same time?

Mr. MANN. I think not. These tubes run from the city post-office in the various cities using the system for the transmission of the mails.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was constructed for the transmission of mails under a contract with the Government?

Mr. MANN. Of course it is owned by a private corporation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not by the city?

Mr. MANN. It is owned by a corporation. They are all practically owned by the same corporation. Its name was very familiar at one time since I first came to Congress. They were as thick as flies at one time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many of these tubes are in service, and in what cities are they in service?

Mr. MANN. Well, I can not tell the gentleman. They are in service now. They are in service in New York and in Chicago, Philadelphia, and, I think, St. Louis also, although I am not sure about that. They are in service principally in New York and Chicago. There are eight or nine miles in Chicago; how many miles there are in New York I do not know.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The bill provides, I may say to the gentleman, that they may be used in other cities.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question or two about this.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If I can have the attention of the committee I can explain the whole matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many cities have this tube service?

Mr. OVERSTREET. If I may have permission I will answer.

Mr. Chairman, under the act of 1902, establishing the operation of the pneumatic-tube service, the service has been installed in five cities—the cities of Boston, New York (including Brooklyn), Philadelphia, Chicago, and St. Louis.

A few years ago authority for the extension of the service was made so as to provide for the service in five additional cities, namely, the cities of Baltimore, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Kansas City, and San Francisco, and further extensions authorized in the original five cities which I have just named. There are no contracts in operation in any one of those five new cities. All of the contracts are in the five original cities. The appropriation is sufficient to carry out the contracts now in existence. It does not cover sufficient money to carry out any new contracts in any one of the five new cities because, even if under the authority they should make the contract, it would be impossible to put them in operation in time to make any draft upon the appropriation during the next fiscal year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much does it carry now?

Mr. OVERSTREET. One million dollars, I think.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much increase is that?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, it is a decrease, as a matter of fact, of two or three hundred thousand dollars. We made a decrease because we found that no new contracts had been entered into. Now, Mr. Chairman, the last proviso the committee has inserted for a certain reason. That is to discourage in the future any new contracts (because the committee recognize the contracts that now exist; and if it did not recognize them it would be unlawful and could not be enforced), but in the future there ought not to be any additional contracts for extension of the service when the city within which the service is situated exercises the power to place heavy exactions upon the service so as to make it a burdensome transaction. This is entirely for mail facilities. These tubes are used for no other purpose at all, and I take it that where the Government has made contracts at considerable expense, at a high rental for the use of the tubes for the benefit of the people of those localities in order to facilitate the collection and delivery of the mail, that those cities should have sufficient patriotism to at least refrain from making extraordinary exactions upon that property.

It may be said, as the gentleman from New York said, what difference is it so long as the contractor makes no objection? There is just this difference, Mr. Chairman: Wherever an unusual charge is laid upon the property the contractors, you may depend upon it, will pass that burden back upon the Government itself in its charges. It is true that the payments now under the various contracts are for the maximum authorized by law, and they will always be the maximum as long as these extra exactions are permitted. And I imagine that in the future, if this tube service shall be extended, if we can be assured that these localities will make no greater tax levy or assessments upon that property than it makes upon property generally of that community, that in time we may hope, at least, and expect lower rental charges.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. One thing I want to call the gentleman's attention to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I want to yield to the gentleman from South Carolina first.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman has already stated what I wanted to ask him. We are paying more, perhaps, in New York than in Boston, so that the burden does now fall back upon the Government.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Now, the gentleman will appreciate the fact that this provision is not entirely for New York and Chicago. Authority is now made by law for the extension to five new cities. But in these cities it is quite possible for these burdens on franchise limitations to be exacted; and if the gentleman will permit me just a moment, under the law of 1902 $17,000 annual rent is the maximum rate in cities where the mileage of the tube service is in excess of 3 miles. By general provision of the law the rate of expense for the tube service is less in each instance than 3 miles, so that it is entirely possible under the law for a higher rate than $17,000 a mile to be tube service shall not exceed 4 per cent of the gross receipts of the post-office in a community where it is proposed to locate the service in those five new cities. The mileage authorized by law is less in each instance than 3 miles, so that it is entirely possible under the law for a higher rate than $17,000 a mile to be made, providing that the total expense in each city shall not exceed 4 per cent of the gross receipts of the office in those respective cities.

Therefore it is important that before any of these contracts shall be made there be a limitation that this expenditure shall not be made where there is an undue requirement or exaction by the city in the franchise.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Right upon that question, in reading this proviso, it seems to me that there is some uncertainty in connection with this question of taxation. The proviso is that no part of this appropriation shall be expended for any extension of the pneumatic-tube service in any city where by limitation of franchise or ordinance a special taxation or exaction, other than the ordinary taxation upon property generally in such city, is imposed.

Upon what? It is not limited to the tube-service property. It may fairly be construed to be upon any other property. It occurred to me that in the interests of certainty that ought to be qualified "imposed upon the tube service."

Mr. OVERSTREET. The meaning of that is that the tube property shall suffer no greater taxation than property generally.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that is the purpose of it, but I think you have not expressed it with sufficient certainty so as to leave it free from doubt.

There is one other proposition. Let me ask the gentleman if provision is made now against the imposition of any extraordinary tax or exaction upon the tube-service property what is the object of the second clause in the proviso, in relation to the character of contracts with the city? Is the Government fully protected by providing against the imposition of any extraordinary taxation or levies upon the tube-service property?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the most objectionable part is the provision for ultimate ownership of the property, because, undoubtedly, where a city, granting an original franchise for tube service to be inaugurated, requires that ultimately the city shall own all of the property it is more objectionable than a simple franchise tax.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But I do not understand how that can affect anything.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Just in this way: Suppose they require that on a ten-year contract at the end of the term the property shall become owned by the city, why, naturally, the parties would not contract with the Government unless they could exact a sufficiently high annual rental to compensate them for the original investment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The parties probably would not construct a tube system, it would seem to me, under any such conditions and limitations. It occurred to me that there is some danger of this standing as a precedent for our regulating the system of taxation in the various municipalities, through limitations upon appropriations. My first impression was that this was a dangerous provision. As explained by the gentleman from Indiana, I can see how it is proper, under certain restrictions. But suppose, now, some gentleman should propose that no part of this money should be expended in any city where the liquor traffic is licensed. That would probably go through the House.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not doubt that it would. That undoubtedly would affect the city of Chicago.

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether it would have any effect in Chicago. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would doubtless apply to several large cities in the country. It seems to me this is a dangerous proposition to enter upon, and that we want to consider it with a good deal of care. But, of course, the Government must protect itself.

Mr. OVERSTREET. With reference to this last provision, relative to ultimate ownership of the tube property, and possible contracts in the five new cities where the service has been authorized to be installed; supposing in any one of those five new cities a contract or franchise should be authorized under the terms of which at the end of ten years the tube property should become owned by the city itself. Then the contracting parties would ask the Government to increase the annual rental of those tubes, so as to enable them to recoup themselves for their original investment.

How do they do it? Why, they refuse to inaugurate the service here except upon the rental, which would be equivalent to the use of the tube for the term of years including their operation and a fair profit on the investment and the original cost of the property.

Mr. MANN. Of course this is a practical question and not a theoretical question merely. The gentleman knows that if any city should require the tube to become its property at the end of ten years, there would be no tube service in a city that made such a requirement. No company could afford to build or operate a tube on those conditions at the rate we are paying. Is it not desirable where the tubes are used for nothing except the transportation of mail, like in Chicago, already in existence, that if possible in the end it shall become the property of the Government?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is a far better proposition than for it to become the property of the city.

Mr. MANN. If it should become the property of Chicago to-morrow, it would be offered to the General Government. The city could make no use of it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not know about that; the city could sell it.

Mr. MANN. All the General Government would have to do would be to omit making appropriations. The General Government has absolute control of the subject. The General Government has the right to refuse to make appropriations except upon its terms, and can just as well say at the expiration of the franchise it will make no appropriation unless the pneumatic tube is turned over to the Government as to say what it is saying now. Would not the gentleman be willing to let the latter provision go out, in view of the attitude of Chicago, to which this only applies, and which attitude is in the interest of the General Government?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have realized ever since this tube subject has been before the committee that it is unpopular in some sections and very popular in others. There are Members strongly prejudiced against it and Members strongly prejudiced in favor of the service. It is a peculiar situation. Undoubtedly in cities where the topography of the city is such as to make it extremely difficult to use the streets for carrying large quantities of mail it is of very great benefit.

In Chicago I think it is of especial benefit because of the drawbridges, the stoppage of traffic on the streets, the congested condition of the streets, and I think in the city of New York it has been of vast benefit. Without it the streets would be greatly congested even with the use of the elevated cars and the subway. It performs a peculiar and important service for the Government. I do not undertake to free the prejudice from the minds of some men that think the corporations are exacting high rentals, and that they ought not to be permitted to do so. Neither do I think that we ought to require that they shall give us the property after the term of the contract has expired. It is a patent. We are obliged to pay for this on account of the patent rights, the same as we discussed this afternoon in relation to canceling machines. We think we have been fairly liberal in the extension of the service. In New York it is being extended rapidly and used extensively. Chicago, St. Louis, Boston have demanded further extension, often more rapidly than the extension has been granted; but in doing that the committee felt that it was not acting unfairly to require that hereafter, in the new extensions where contracts have not already been entered into, there should be some sort of limitation relative to the ownership at least of the tube properties so that we might avoid, if possible, the continuance of high rental charges.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has been no contract let up to this time which has not provided a maximum amount that shall be paid.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How do we benefit any by coming to the relief of this one company and freeing it from exactions to which it willingly submitted? It is simply stopping it from dividing profits with the municipality.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I suppose that if any impairment of the authority for the tube service or of the appropriation carried should be determined upon by the House, my friend from New York and my friend from Illinois would be among the first to complain against such impairment of the service in their own or other cities.

It is a good service, and gentlemen must admit that it has not been abused up to date; and the only desire we have is that before any additional contract shall be made in any of these new cities, or even an extension of service in any of the old cities shall be made, we shall have set our faces against the cities themselves becoming parties to the increased burdens upon this service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to this: Under the law of the State of New York, under the charter of the city of New York, the city can not grant any franchise in perpetuity. It must have a provision in it which limits the rights granted to a specified time. Suppose somebody should suggest that this extension shall not be made in any city where a franchise shall not be granted in perpetuity. It can be argued in that case just as strongly as it can in this one, where this corporation was willing to take the franchise under which it was to surrender all of its property at the end of the twenty years. Why should we interfere in a dispute between a municipality and a private corporation?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Indiana spoke of some who have a strong prejudice against the pneumatic tube and this service. I have a strong prejudice against the service, as he well knows. I want to ask him if it is not a fact that the pneumatic-tube service means refinement of facility which sometimes defeats itself, and my point is this, that the last part of the large given amount of mail will arrive through a pneumatic tube at its destination at a later time than it would if carried by ordinary wagons.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I presume if there were but one wagon load of mail, and it all of the first class, that the last letter which might have been transported through the tube would have reached the office just as quickly if it had been transported from the wagon, but there is, as a rule, much more mail than a wagon load in cities where the service is installed, and it is difficult to put into practice the proposition which the gentleman submits, because there is a continuous stream of letters through the tube.

As long as there are letters to be sent either to the office or to one of the stations fed by the tube, this stream of letters keeps up. Now, I doubt whether there has ever been a time in actual practice where they took just the mail from one particular load and started it through one particular tube. So that in practice the theoretical proposition submitted by my friend from Kansas, I think, would never happen.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman actually believes, then, that the pneumatic-tube service does facilitate the bulk of the first-class mail.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Unquestionably in these cities where it is in use.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Kansas overlooks the fact that it is distributed in the office as quickly as it arrives when it comes through the tube.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understand that out in Kansas City, Mo., where there is a provision for a pneumatic-tube service to carry the mail from the Union Depot to the post-office, the great bulk of the mail carried by wagons will arrive at the post-office before it will by pneumatic tube. I wish also to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] to this proposition, that by very reason of the large mail in cities, even if you do have an ever continuing line of mail through the pneumatic tube, from station to station or from railroad to station to post-office, the last part of any great bulk of mail is delayed and not facilitated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that this service is unsuitable for short distances, such as that in Kansas City, I believe is confirmed by the opinion of post-office officials who have given any consideration whatever to this service. The value of this service lies not so much for short distances as where the distances are long and where the collections of mail are frequent. For instance, in Philadelphia they used that service originally between the main post-office and the Bourse substation, a distance of half a mile, and from the main station to the Reading terminal and Broad Street station. It was the opinion of the postal officials of that city that mail could be much more expeditiously dispatched to those points by wagon than by pneumatic tube; but in a city where you have trains arriving very frequently, as in New York City, where 90 per cent of all the mail arrives and departs over the New York Central and the Pennsylvania railroads, it is of great value in dispatching the mail to the trains and from the trains to the many postal stations in the city.

Then, again, it is of value in the transmission of city mail, which is very large in New York, because, as gentlemen are aware, these tubes have connections with postal stations, and it would require an hour or more to have that mail carried by screened-wagon service, which is the only method of service in New York, whereas by this tube service it can be taken from Station H, at the New York Central depot, to the main post-office or to the Wall street station or to Brooklyn in the course of from six to twelve minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like the gentleman to explain to the committee, if he can, why it is that these extensions have not been made in the cities named in the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. To be frank with the gentleman, there is one company, though under different names, that operates this system in the five respective cities in which the service is now in operation. A few years ago there were two rival companies, but now one company has gained control of the entire system and owns some of the patents. Of course, there are different means of conveyance by pneumatic tube and other devices, but this company has control of one set of patents.

The reason why they have not been extended is largely because they have limited capital, and they can make more money by investing that capital in those cities where the cost of construction is less than in cities where the cost of construction is great. For example, the greatest extension of this service has been during the last two years in the city of Philadelphia. Until two years ago there was in the neighborhood of a mile and a half of service. At the present time there are nearly 4 miles in operation, and there are under contract 7.35 miles. There, as the gentleman from Philadelphia and others who are acquainted with the topography of that city know, it is easy to excavate to lay the tubes. They have no marshes there; and I have seen during the past two years the ease with which they have extended the pipes from the main post-office to the Fairmount Avenue station, and up to Columbia avenue and Tenth street, and another line of tubes from Columbia avenue to Ridge road, and still another south to the Snyder Avenue station.

In that city, which is the only city, I may say, where there have been any extensions during recent years, the company has utilized its available funds for the extension of the system. It was more profitable, as a bare statement of the subject will show that they could make more money by extending the system in one city than by branching it out by piecemeal in these other five cities where the service was very limited in extent, as, for instance, in Kansas City, where it was proposed to extend it not more than a mile and a half, and in Cincinnati about 1½ or 2 miles, and in Baltimore less than a mile, and where they would receive for those short distances the maximum of $17,000 a mile.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. In New York, I may say, the service is being extended in Brooklyn, and also in the outlying suburbs; but some of the extensions have been delayed because of the building of the new Pennsylvania station. In Chicago one of the difficulties encountered in the extension of the service has been the limitation in the franchise which provided that these tubes should revert to the city at the expiration of fifteen years. The company, as I stated a few moments ago, thought it was more practicable and a better investment, as their means were limited, to invest them in those localities where they did not have restrictions, and accordingly they have centered all their extensions there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman state who recommended the provisos that are contained in this paragraph?

Mr. STAFFORD. To which provisos does the gentleman refer?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The ones about the extraordinary tax and the one about the ultimate ownership of the property by cities. I have searched through the estimates and hearings and have been unable to find any recommendation by any official. I would be glad to know just who made this recommendation.

Mr. STAFFORD. If you will examine the hearings you will find that there are various communications that were sent to members of the committee protesting against the existing conditions of the pneumatic-tube service in Chicago and also protesting against the continuation of the limitations in the franchise that prevented the extension of the service to the outlying suburbs which has been recommended by the board that investigated this system some few years ago.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman call my attention to where these communications can be found in the hearings? I have not been able to find them.

Mr. STAFFORD. On page 261 of the hearings and subsequent pages he will find a letter from Mr. David R. Forgan, president of the First National Bank, addressed to Mr. George W. Hinman, president of the Inter Ocean Publishing Company, Chicago, in which he directs attention to the general service in Chicago, and some other communications.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman tell me whether Mr. Forgan or his bank has any interest in this tube-service company or has been approached to finance this extension?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing disclosed in the record and nothing presented to the committee that showed any interest on the part of Mr. Forgan except as a citizen of Chicago interested in the service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The president of one national bank and the Pneumatic Tube Company itself wrote letters, and then there are some resolutions adopted by the chamber of commerce. I undertake to say, from what my experience has been, that a chamber of commerce in a large city will pass a resolution in favor of anything that can be suggested to a legislative body; and if that is the only thing upon which the recommendation has been based it does not impress me very much.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, it is quite evident that we can not conclude this paragraph this evening. I suggest that we stop at this point. I want to ask unanimous consent to recur to page 5, which I think will take just a minute.

Mr. MURDOCK. A parliamentary inquiry. Has a point of order been reserved to any part of this paragraph or the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been reserved against the paragraph.

Mr. OVERSTREET. At page 5 of the bill, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER], I understand, will withdraw his point of order against the proviso contained in lines 12, 13, 14, and 15. I desire to have that put back in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to return to a paragraph on page 5 of the bill for the purpose stated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, being fully persuaded of the propriety of the provision as reported by the committee, I respectfully withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the point of order being withdrawn, the Chair thinks the better practice would be for the gentleman from Indiana to move an amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move to reinsert in the bill lines 12, 13, 14, and 15, on page 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word, "dollars." in page 5, line 12, insert:
"Provided, That hereafter a second assistant postmaster may be employed at the city of Chicago post-office at an annual compensation of $2,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, several days ago I addressed the committee upon the question of ocean mail subsidy. I desire now to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks made by him in committee on a former day concerning this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the amendment I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend the remarks made upon his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the post-office appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9205. An act to make the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1891 (26 Stats., p. 796), applicable to the Territory of New Mexico; and

H. R. 16860. An act to establish a United States land district in the Territory of New Mexico to be known as the Tucumcari land district.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported the bill (H. R. 19158) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the schooner Hazard, Barnabus Young, master—to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Hans Peter Guttormsen against the United States—to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1770) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Albany, in the State of Oregon, reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5123) to authorize the extension of the public building in the city of Manchester, N. H., and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2671) authorizing extra officers for the Army, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4540) authorizing extra officers for the Army, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to, a similar bill having been favorably reported.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4856) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to lease San Clemente Island, California, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5983) authorizing certain life-saving apparatus to be placed at the Farallone Islands, off the coast of California, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5516) providing for the erection of a public building at Independence, Mo., reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment proposing to appropriate $90,000 for the payment of salaries, traveling expenses, purchase of supplies, and other necessary expenditures as may be required to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to make investigations on Indian reservations, etc., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and moved that it, with the accompanying papers, be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which was agreed to.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3452) for the relief of Joseph Schrembs, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5604) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reserve lands on Indian reservations for power and reservoir sites, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BULKELEY. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4749) for the relief of Dewitt Eastman, to report it with an amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I desire to call the attention of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to the bill first reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BULKELEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6006) to correct the military record of John M. Miller, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PAWTUCKET, R. I.

Mr. WETMORE. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5656) for the enlargement and extension of the post-office building at Pawtucket, R. I., to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts for the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of the post-office building at Pawtucket, R. I., including the necessary extension, alteration, remodeling, improvement, or repairs to plumbing, heating, and ventilating systems in said building incident thereto, at a total limit of cost of not to exceed $55,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATIONS FOR REGATTAS OR MARINE PARADES.

Mr. FRYE. From the Committee on Commerce I report back without amendment the bill (S. 6028) to provide for safety of life on navigable waters during regattas or marine parades, and I submit a report thereon. It is very important that the bill shall receive early enactment into law on account of the receiving of the battle ships at San Francisco, where there will be gathered an enormous fleet of all sorts of vessels.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. BACON. I am not familiar with the measure. I do not ask for any extended explanation of it, but if the Senator will please state in a few words the scope and purpose of the bill I will be obliged to him.

Mr. FRYE. The present law provides for the use of vessels to insure safety at regattas, but it does not make any provision for national affairs, like the reception of the fleet at San Francisco, and there are two or three more of those occasions to happen in the near future. The bill repeals the old regatta law, and simply adds to it the authority to look out for safety in the case of other affairs than regattas.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It is an enlargement of the old law.

Mr. FRYE. It is an enlargement of it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAINY RIVER DAM IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 15444) extending the time for the construction of a dam across Rainy River, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was, on page 2, line 4, after the words "said acts," to insert:

Is hereby authorized to construct and maintain a dam across Rainy River, Minnesota, at the place designated in said acts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be

The bill was read the third time and passed.

SURVEY OF GALVESTON HARBOR, TEXAS.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. BAILEY on the 11th instant, reported it without amendment: read a third time.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey of Galveston Harbor, as a whole, including Galveston Harbor, Galveston channel, Texas City channel, and Port Bolivar channel, in the State of Texas, for the purpose of establishing a broad, comprehensive, and systematic plan for the future extension, enlargement, and deepening of said harbor, so as to meet the growing needs of commerce, and to estimate the probable cost thereof.

MISSOURI RIVER DAM IN MONTANA.

Mr. SMITH. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5908) to amend an act authorizing the construction of a dam and bridge across the Missouri River in the State of Montana, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WICHITA, KANS.

Mr. WARNER. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 5894) to provide for the completion of the enlargement of the public building at Wichita, Kans., and for other purposes, and I submit a report thereon. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the limit of cost of the United States post-office and public building at Wichita, Kans., be increased from the sum of $50,000 to the sum of $56,000, said increase to be used for extension, enlargement, and remodeling purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, hereafter I shall insist on the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there further reports of committees?

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. FULTON. Some days ago, as chairman of the Committee on Claims, I reported back the bill (H. R. 15372) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker acts. In looking the bill over and checking the items I discover so many errors which will require so many amendments to be made that I have concluded to ask leave to withdraw the report for the purpose of correcting the errors. I will then very shortly submit another report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FULTON. The order carriers the report back to the committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It carries to the committee both the bill and the report.

The Chair would suggest that heretofore a number of amendments to the omnibus claims bill have been submitted, ordered to be printed, and to lie upon the table. As the bill has been recommitted to the Committee on Claims, without objection the amendments heretofore ordered to lie on the table will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 6072) authorizing the purchase of a site for a building for the accommodation of the Supreme Court of the United States, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 6091) authorizing the acceptance of a site and providing for the construction and maintenance thereon of a temporary building for post-office purposes during the erection and completion of the new post-office building at Richmond, Va., which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. KNOX introduced a bill (S. 6092) for the relief of John A. Henderson, assistant engineer, United States Navy, retired, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CURTIS introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6093) granting a pension to Martain Feeney; and

A bill (S. 6094) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Williams (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. WARNER introduced a bill (S. 6095) granting a pension to Nora R. Willett, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6096) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of James B. Hassett, deceased, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6097) to amend and correct the records of Company D, Seventh Regiment Provisional Enrolled Missouri Militia, by including the name of Valentine Fraker therein, with the dates of his enlistment and discharge; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HEYBURN introduced a bill (S. 6098) to authorize the President to appoint Lieut. Col. William H. Corbusier, upon retirement, a brigadier-general, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LIGHT-HOUSE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. PERKINS. I introduce a joint resolution granting authority for the use of certain balances of appropriations for the Light-House Establishment to be available for certain named purposes, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 69) granting authority for the use of certain balances of appropriations for the Light-House Establishment to be available for certain named purposes was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the balances of the appropriations for the construction of vessels for the Light-House Establishment appropriated for in the acts of Congress approved April 28, 1904 (33 Stats., p. 468); March 3, 1905 (33 Stats., p. 1171); June 30, 1906 (34 Stats., pp. 659, 660, 710, and 711), and March 4, 1907 (34 Stats., pp. 1317, 1318, and 1319), are hereby made available for the pay of officers and crews, the payment of consular fees, port dues, and exchange, the purchase of provisions, rations, fuel, engineer stores and supplies, pilotage, water, laundry, and all other necessary incidental expenses in the transfer of the following-named vessels of the Light-House Establishment from Tompkinsville, N. Y., where they are to be delivered when completed, to their respective stations: Tenders for the twelfth light-house district, for the thirteenth light-house district, for the Pacific Ocean, for Lake Superior; relief light vessel for the Pacific coast; Columbia River light vessel, Oregon; Swiftsure Bank light vessel, Washington.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DICK submitted an amendment proposing to strike out in the Army appropriation bill the proviso relating to trophies and medals authorized to be contested for only by the enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the National Guard or organized militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000,000 for paying the expenses of the organized militia of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, which may be authorized by the Secretary of War to participate in such encampments as may be established for the field instruction of the troops of the Regular Army, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000,000 for paying the expenses of regiments, battalions, squadrons, and batteries of the organized militia of any State, Territory, or of the District of Columbia, which may be authorized by the Secretary of War to participate in such encampments as may be established for the field instruction of the troops of the Regular Army, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment authorizing the President to appoint to the grade of major-general on the retired list, and to commission as such any brigadier-general of not less than thirty-five years' active service now borne on that list, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRANE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000,000 for pay of letter carriers entitled to promotion to the sixth grade, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment relative to the pay of certain officers of the Army, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. DICK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McENERY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

INTEREST ON GOVERNMENT DEPOSITS.

Mr. NELSON. I submit a proposed amendment to the so-called "Aldrich bill," which I ask may be read and printed and lie on the table.

The amendment was read, ordered to be printed, and to lie on the table, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. NELSON to the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws, viz:

"Amend the bill by adding an additional section, as follows:

"SEC. —. That all of said national banking associations designated as depositaries of public money and receiving such money on deposit shall pay to the United States, through the Secretary of the Treasury, interest upon such deposit at the rate of 2 per cent per annum upon the average weekly balance of said deposit."

WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE.

On motion of Mr. CULBERSON, it was Ordered, That 500 additional copies of Senate "Executive I," Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, "Waters of the Rio Grande," being a confidential communication from the President of the United States, made public June 21, 1906, be printed for the use of the Senate.

HAMILTON'S REPORT ON A NATIONAL BANK.

On motion of Mr. FLINT, it was Ordered, That the Report on a National Bank, December 13, 1790, by Alexander Hamilton, be printed as a document.

RECEIPTS FROM SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. FLINT, it was Ordered, That 3,000 additional copies of the bill (S. 4855) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States to the construction of works for the drainage or reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the United States, and for other purposes, with report accompanying same, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

On motion of Mr. KNOX, it was Ordered, That there be printed 5,000 copies of Senate bill 5508, to establish a system of postal savings banks, and for other purposes, to be placed in the document room for the use of the Senate.

LOTS 13 AND 14, SQUARE 959, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the Senate on the 16th of January passed Senate bill 903, and I move that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the title of the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 903) to amend section 2, chapter 433, 30 Statutes at Large, entitled "An act to confirm title to lots 13 and 14, in square 959, in Washington, D. C."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

ACCOUNTS OF WILLIAM R. LITTLE.

Mr. STONE. On January 27 the bill (S. 819) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to examine and adjust the accounts of William R. Little, or his heirs, with the Sac and Fox Indians, was passed by the Senate and sent to the House. The following day the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and the bill was returned from the House January 29. The motion has been pending since. I should like to call it up and have it disposed of.

I think I may say that while the Senator from Nebraska insists that he is not in favor of such legislation he will not press an objection in this instance, although he does not care to withdraw the motion. The bill was debated at some length on two occasions when it was before the Senate, for it has passed the Senate twice, and I should like to have it disposed of now.

Mr. BURKETT. I have certainly no objection to the matter being disposed of. At the time when I made the motion to reconsider it seemed to me that the bill should have been given more consideration and I intended to look up some more references. I had gone through the bill and was opposed to it myself; but I certainly do not intend to hang up a bill here just by an objection or a motion to reconsider. I have no right to ask that it be detained longer, and I am willing that a vote shall be taken on the motion to reconsider.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the motion entered to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 819 was passed be now considered. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KEAN. I thought we had a special order for this morning. I do not want to object to the request of the Senator from Missouri, but if it is going to take any time I shall object and insist on the regular order.

Mr. STONE. I simply desire to have a vote of the Senate taken on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. KEAN. If it takes no time, I do not object.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the motion in order now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri asked unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. STONE. It is a motion to reconsider, and I simply ask to have the Senate vote upon it. The bill has passed the Senate twice.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is a special order for this morning, and it seems to me the motion had better lie on the table until we find out something about the nature of the bill.

Mr. STONE. Of course if the Senator objects it goes over, but he will not know anything more about the bill when it is called up again.

Mr. ALDRICH. I may not know any more about it after I have read the bill, but I should like to read the bill—I will read the bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made and the regular order is demanded.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the joint resolution touching transportation of material in the construction of the Panama Canal.

TRANSACTIONS OF NEW YORK CITY BANKS, ETC.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have been waiting for an opportunity to introduce a resolution. If that order of business has come and passed by reason of the confusion in the Chamber I should like to introduce the resolution now. I do not want to speak on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Thank you, sir.

At various times I have endeavored to get the probe into some transactions in the Treasury Department. I introduced two resolutions a year or more ago and they were referred to the Committee on Finance and died there. I have introduced two or three at this session and they have all gone the same way, although the Senator from Rhode Island, the chairman of that committee, has incorporated some of the inquiries which I sought to have made into other resolutions.

I am going to make one more effort, and I send to the desk a resolution which I ask to have read and then printed and lie on the table until Monday, when I shall submit some remarks on it, in the hope that the Senator from Rhode Island will be less suspicious of my efforts at getting light, and will enable us to get some information which I think very desirable.

Mr. FRYE. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance is hereby instructed to inquire and report:

First. Whether the national banks in the city of New York and elsewhere are in the habit, under the guise of commercial loans, of furnishing permanent capital for speculative or other enterprises, and if so, what legislation is necessary to prevent a continuance of such practice.

Second. Whether the Treasury Department had knowledge of the loans made by the National Bank of North America, of New York City, which are the subject of a suit by the receiver of said bank against Charles W. Morse, and of other similar transactions in other national banks.

Third. Whether national banks are now engaged, by themselves or through other organizations, in attempting to control or dictate the legislation of Congress upon currency matters.

Fourth. The committee is further instructed to ascertain what, if any, legislation is necessary to discourage or prevent the habit of persons holding the office of Comptroller of the Currency or other Treasury officials from making their offices a stepping-stone to employment by national banks.

Fifth. Whether national banks are using trust companies or other financial associations as agencies through which to transact business forbidden by the law governing national banks, and what legislation is necessary to prevent such an evasion of the statutes.

Sixth. Whether the national banks in New York City lent their credit to the stockbrokers by the certification or acceptance of checks during the years 1906 and 1907, and report whether or not such transactions involved any violation of the provisions of section 5200 of the Revised Statutes as to making excess loans.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina reminds me that more than a month ago the Senate adopted a resolution which I introduced calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to send to the Senate whatever telegrams and letters might have been received by that Department from national banks of the interior protesting against the failure of the New York banks to send them their reserves.

I have endeavored to keep the run of this matter to see whether any response has been made to that resolution; and I now ask the Chair if any response has yet been made to the resolution, which was adopted more than a month ago?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that there has been no response made to the Senate.

MATERIAL FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. FRYE. I now ask that under the unanimous consent agreement the Chair lay before the Senate the joint resolution S. R. No. 40.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 40) to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I want the attention of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] for one moment. I accepted the other day an amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana excluding Gulf ports from the provisions of this joint resolution. I find in the Constitution this language:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another, etc.

It looks to me very much as if the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana might expose the joint resolution, if it became a law, to the charge of being unconstitutional, and I now give the Senator from Louisiana notice that when the joint resolution gets into the Senate. if it ever gets there, from the Committee of the Whole, I shall ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment, and shall offer in its place one which practically does the same thing, by inserting in line 10, after the word "unreasonable," the words "or the President shall find that no such vessel of the United States can be secured for the trade." That will include every one of the Gulf ports, several of the south Atlantic ports, and some of the Pacific ports from the operation of the joint resolution just as much and just as completely as if they were excluded in words. I think it only fair to the Senator from Louisiana that I should tell him this before the joint resolution proceeds any further.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, under those conditions would not the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] be willing to withdraw his amendment, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], in charge of the joint resolution, could then present his amendment covering all these cases.

Mr. BACON. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana has already been adopted.

Mr. FOSTER. I will examine the amendment which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has proposed before the joint resolution is disposed of this morning, and I will come to some conclusion upon that subject.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, when the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] was offered, I was willing to stand by that. It was prepared by the Senator from Louisiana, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and myself after the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] had refused to accept one which had been drawn by us and presented to him. The amendment which was offered by the Senator from Louisiana and accepted by the Senator from Maine was not as satisfactory to the Senator from Louisiana nor to the Senator from Texas nor to myself as the one which I have here, which I intended to introduce and which had been presented to the Senator from Maine, but which he declined to accept.

Now, as I understand, the amendment which was read by the Senator from Maine would first require the President to ascertain whether there were any vessels such as named in the joint resolution which were available for the purpose of transporting the material and the equipment for the construction of the canal. Before that is determined no man who wants to bid on any proposition to supply material and equipment for the construction of the canal would know how to bid, because he would not know whether the President was going to decide that the material could be carried in any other than the character of vessels named in the resolution. He ought to be advised of that fact before he made his bid, so that he could make his bid advisedly.

As the Senator from Maine says, there is no vessel of the United States plying between any of the Gulf ports and Panama. There ought not to be any restriction upon any port between which and the Isthmus of Panama there is no such vessel plying, as is described in the resolution. It ought to be known to the bidder who proposes to bid for the furnishing of material and equipment for the construction of the canal that if he can not get American vessels in which to ship the material which he proposes to ship and which he bids for the shipment of to the canal, he will not be precluded from shipping it for that reason, and can make the shipment of his freight upon vessels of foreign registry.

This is an amendment which I think would cover it, and then it would not be left to any inquiry by the President or by anybody else. Under any circumstances a bidder would know that if he could not get an American registered vessel he could then ship his freight in foreign bottoms. I think an amendment like this would meet the situation:

This resolution shall not apply to any port of the United States between which and the Isthmus of Panama there is no vessel owned by the United States, nor by the Panama Railroad Company, nor vessel of the United States plying, adequate to carry the commerce offered between such port and the Isthmus of Panama.

It seems to me there ought not to be any objection to that. Every State west of the Mississippi River, as well as every Gulf State and every State that ships through the Gulf ports and through the South Atlantic ports, is interested in this.

I am going to offer that amendment, whatever may be the agreement as to any other. I do not know what the Senate will do with it, but I am going to offer that language as an amendment. If the Senator from Maine shall repudiate his acceptance of the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, which he had before accepted——

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. I want to understand the Senator's amendment correctly. He does not intend that the proposed law shall not apply to any port where there is no vessel owned by the United States plying?

Mr. McLAURIN. Not at all. It does not say that.

Mr. LODGE. I did not think it did, but some Senators were of the opinion that it did. Of course such an amendment would make the joint resolution absolutely useless and worthless——

Mr. McLAURIN. The amendment does not say that.

Mr. LODGE. Because the United States only owns one or two.

Mr. McLAURIN. The amendment says if there is no vessel owned by the United States, nor a vessel owned by the Panama Railroad Company, nor a vessel of the United States plying between those ports and the Isthmus of Panama, then this resolution shall not apply. It ought not to apply, and I think the Senator will agree with me.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the amendment as the Senator does, and I wished him to explain it, as there are other Senators who take a different view of it.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that he use the language, "ships under American register." Then it would be plain.

Mr. McLAURIN. I put it to follow the language of the Senator from Maine in his resolution.

Mr. BACON. Ships other than those of the Government and of the Panama Canal ought to be designated as ships under American registry.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to some statistics showing the shipments of material from New Orleans alone to the Isthmus of Panama.

For the year ending June 30, 1906:

Shipments from New Orleans to Canal Commission	$481,003.11
Shipments from New Orleans to Panama Railroad, commissary	32,091.75
Shipments from New Orleans to Panama Railroad, material	157,000.00
Total	670,094.86

For the year ending June 30, 1907:

Shipments from New Orleans to Canal Commission	$887,915.73
Shipments from New Orleans to Panama Railroad, commissary	56,203.26
Shipments from New Orleans to Panama Railroad, material	174,489.94
Total	1,118,608.93

Now, for this year to the date of this letter, March 5, 1908, the shipments were as follows:

Shipments from New Orleans to Canal Commission	$165,788.03
Shipments from New Orleans to Panama Railroad, commissary	159,713.71
Shipments from New Orleans to Panama Railroad, material	70,007.21
Total	395,508.95

If the shipments keep up at that rate for the balance of the year, they will aggregate nearly $2,000,000 from New Orleans alone. Every State west of the Mississippi River is interested in this. The State of Mississippi, for which I am particularly solicitous, is interested in it. Justice is interested in permitting every man an equal opportunity; and the provision of the Constitution which was read by the Senator from Maine here as a foundation for his repudiation of his acceptance of the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana is violated if this resolution is adopted without some amendment like that, because it will give preference to certain ports in the United States for the shipment of material to the Isthmus.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Mississippi state just exactly what he means by "this resolution."

Mr. McLAURIN. I will state what I mean.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator read the resolution?

Mr. McLAURIN. I will read it, and I will ask the careful attention of the Senate to the reading of the resolution:

This resolution shall not apply to any port of the United States between which and the Isthmus of Panama there is no vessel owned by the United States, nor by the Panama Railroad Company, nor vessel of the United States plying adequate to carry the commerce offered between such port and the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. I am trying to get at what would be the real operation of the Senator's amendment. The language "plying to any port of the United States between which and the Isthmus of Panama there is no vessel owned by the United States" includes all naval vessels.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Transports and so forth.

Mr. HALE. Transports and all vessels in which the title rests with the United States without limitation. Is it the Senator's idea that the clause in the latter part of the amendment, "nor vessels of the United States," shall also mean all vessels owned by the Government?

Mr. McLAURIN. I mean if there is no such vessel owned by the Government nor by the Panama Railroad Company, nor a vessel of the United States—that is registered in the United States—then the provisions of the joint resolution shall not apply to that port. I have put in the resolution here "regularly plying." The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in charge of this joint resolution said that there is no port from which there is any such vessel regularly plying, and I therefore struck out that word just this minute.

Mr. HALE. I am not calling the Senator's attention to that part of it.

Mr. McLAURIN. My attention was probably diverted. I mean merchant vessels. I have no reference to the Navy.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that. I am trying to see what is covered by the three classes of vessels named in the Senator's amendment. The first class, as I understand, is "vessels owned by the United States." He puts them first. That is all right, and I do not object to that. The second one is "or owned by the Panama Railroad Company." Nobody objects to that. The next clause is "nor vessels of the United States." Does not the Senator mean in that classification to include all merchant vessels?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do.

Mr. HALE. All vessels of United States registry?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do.

Mr. HALE. I so understood, and the only distinction between the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi and that offered by the Senator in charge of the joint resolution is that the former embodies in the law, if it shall become a law, the object sought to be obtained, and my colleague [Mr. FRYE] has made his amendment dependent upon the action of the President before it operates. It is for my colleague to say whether he thinks that so essential.

Mr. McLAURIN. One moment——

Mr. HALE. I understand that the phrase "vessels of the United States" means merchant vessels or vessels of United States registry.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is it.

Mr. HALE. But we can easily change that if there is any doubt about it. There is not in my mind any such doubt.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

Mr. McLAURIN. In order that I may answer one at a time, I will yield to the junior Senator from Maine in a moment. This is the language of the resolution:

That in any contract hereafter made, transportation by sea of material and equipment from the United States for use in the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to vessels owned by the United States or by the Panama Railroad Company, or to vessels of the United States chartered by the United States or by the Panama Railroad Company, or to vessels of the United States tendered by the lowest responsible bidder.

I am perfectly willing to say in the proposed amendment "vessels under American registry."

Mr. HALE. "Under United States registry."

Mr. McLAURIN. "Under United States registry." I am willing to make it read:

This resolution shall not apply to any port of the United States between which and the Isthmus of Panama there is no vessel owned by the United States, nor by the Panama Railroad Company, nor vessel of United States registry plying, adequate to carry the commerce offered between such port and the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think that his resolution meets the point made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] about the constitutionality of the resolution?

Mr. McLAURIN. There is no doubt about that. The Senator does not raise any question as to the constitutionality of my amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As to the constitutionality of the amendment?

Mr. McLAURIN. No, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, if the Senator from Maine does not—it is not my bill—but, as a matter of law, I do not think there is any question but that it does directly——

Mr. McLAURIN. Does directly?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does directly, beyond question, contravene the provision of the Constitution to which the Senator from Maine has referred.

Mr. McLAURIN. It undoubtedly does not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is a difference of opinion.

Mr. McLAURIN. No lawyer who has examined it——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator from Maine is satisfied, I am not going to make any objection.

Mr. McLAURIN. No lawyer who has examined it will say that the amendment I propose contravenes the Constitution. There can not be any question of its constitutionality. If there is any question of constitutionality, it is in the resolution itself, because the resolution confines the shipment of material and equipment for the construction of the canal to ports that have American registered vessels plying between them and the Isthmus of Panama, and if there are certain ports that do not have such vessels, then there is a preference given by the resolution itself to the ports that do have the American registered vessels plying between them and the Panama Canal. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] is a good lawyer, when he has investigated a question, but he does not seem to be when it comes impromptu to him so far as this constitutional question is concerned, for he would see that if there is any question of constitutionality at all, it would be as to the resolution without this amendment, instead of to the constitutionality of this amendment. Now, I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. I want to ask the Senator a question. I can not exactly read the amendment as my colleague [Mr. HALE] does or as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] does. The amendment reads:

This resolution shall not apply to any port of the United States between which and the Isthmus of Panama there is no vessel owned by the United States.

Now, stop there. It would exclude from the provisions of this joint resolution every port between Maine and Florida, because there is not a United States vessel owned in any port in that entire length.

Mr. McLAURIN. Fortunately the resolution does not stop there. It goes on and says, "nor by the Panama Railroad Company, nor vessel of the United States." The last clause may be changed to read "under the register of the United States." If the amendment stopped where the Senator says, it would be liable to the objection he interposes.

Mr. FRYE. I want to ask the Senator another question. What does he mean by excluding a port where there is "regularly" plying a vessel?

Mr. McLAURIN. I will strike out "regularly."

Mr. FRYE. Well, then, the word "plying." That would cut out the port of New York.

Mr. McLAURIN. Is there a vessel plying between New York and Panama sufficient to carry material?

Mr. FRYE. There is a line plying between New York and Panama.

Mr. McLAURIN. Very well, then it would not cut New York out. If there is a line plying between that city and Panama, it would apply to New York, and no foreign ship could carry any material between New York and Panama.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator leaves out "regularly." Why does he not leave out "plying" and have it read:

Vessel of the United States adequate to carry the commerce offered between such ports and the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. McLAURIN. Because if you leave out the word "plying," it would read "between which and the Isthmus, etc., there is no vessel." If you leave out the word "plying," it would not cover it as well.

Mr. FRYE. I do not see the slightest object in putting in the word "plying."

Mr. McLAURIN. If a vessel does not "ply" it can not "carry."

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he would not be satisfied with the amendment which has been accepted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] if that amendment were amended by striking out the word "ports" and the words "nor to," so that the amendment would read:

Provided, That this resolution shall not apply to any port of the United States from which such vessels of the United States can not be secured for the trade.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think that is good.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It seems to me that that amendment in that language and in that form would cover the difficulty that the Senator seeks to remedy.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think so.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. If not, why not?

Mr. FRYE. I am inclined to accept the amendment, if the Senator will leave out the word "plying." I do not think it means anything; and if it does mean anything, it cuts out the port of New York from the provisions of this joint resolution. I do not see any object in having "plying" in it at all. It seems to be senseless to me.

Mr. McLAURIN. It may be senseless to the Senator from Maine, but it is not senseless to me. Leave out the word "plying" and it will read:

If there are vessels adequate to carry the commerce.

There might be vessels adequate to carry the commerce, but they might not be accessible. What good would it do the ports of Biloxi, Pascagoula, or Bay St. Louis, on the Gulf coast, if there were abundant vessels of the United States adequate to carry this commerce, if they were not plying there and if access to them could not be had?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator insists on the word "plying"—"vessels plying." There is a possibility that that might be construed as vessels which at present are plying; and the Senator does not want to do that?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not.

Mr. HALE. No. Why not, then, use the words "vessels that may ply between," so that it shall not be confined to vessels that are now plying, but are so situated that they may ply between the ports.

Mr. BACON. I would suggest to the Senator that the interpolation of the word "then," before the word "plying," if it is used, would meet his views.

Mr. McLAURIN. I am willing to do that, or I am willing to put it "plying at the time."

Mr. HALE. You do not want that. It seems to me you want this to apply to vessels that are not already plying there, but are ready to ply. We do not want it confined to vessels that are "then plying," because precious few, and perhaps none, are now plying.

Mr. BACON. "Then plying" would confine it to the time of the contract.

Mr. HALE. We want it to apply to vessels that are adequate to this trade and that may ply between the ports.

Mr. McLAURIN. I think I can put in a word that will meet the suggestion of the Senator.

Mr. HALE. Let us see.

Mr. McLAURIN. Suppose we say "plying when needed for such purpose?" I think that would cover the case.

Mr. HALE. I think that would cover it, if my colleague is satisfied.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, the object of this resolution is to restrict or limit to American bottoms all shipments made from this country to the Panama Canal Commission or to the Panama Railroad Company or to the commissary department on the Zone. I presume the immediate cause which brought about the introduction of this resolution and the earnest advocacy of its passage is the fact that within a very short period the Panama Commission will advertise for bids for the purchase and transportation of some million tons of coal to be used in the construction and equipment of the great works on the Isthmus.

As this resolution came from the committee apparently with a unanimous report, there being no minority report accompanying it, I naturally presume that it had the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Commerce.

When the press of the country gave it out that this resolution had passed, the business men of the city of New Orleans and different exchanges and the board of trade sent to me and to other members of this body a very earnest protest against its passage and sought to enlist our efforts in opposition to the measure. Their protest was not based upon any factious or idle opposition to this measure, but it originated from an honest belief on the part of the great business interests of that city that the passage of this resolution necessarily meant a fatal blow to the shipping interests of that city.

I desire to read an extract from a letter which I received from the president of the board of trade of that city, in which he says:

> All shipments of Panama supplies out of this port, through force of circumstances, are carried in foreign bottoms, and the board is of the firm belief that if this measure becomes a law it will practically put our port, as well as other Gulf ports, out of business so far as Panama supplies are concerned.

Of course if this statement be true, it is enough to excite the opposition and the just opposition not only of the citizens and business men of the port of New Orleans, but of every other port similarly situated.

During the year 1906 the value of the shipments from that port to the Commission—not to the port of Colon, but to the Commission—amounted to $670,094.86. During the year 1907 similar shipments amounted to $1,118,608.92, and up to the date of the writing of this letter, February 22, the value of the shipments from that port amounted to $395,508.95.

If this measure becomes a law without some amendment, there is not a pound of these shipments that will go through the port of New Orleans, for the simple reason that there is not in this trade a ship from that port flying the American flag.

Upon investigation it was found that what was true as to New Orleans was true as to every other Gulf port—that there is not a ship of American registry in a single Gulf port plying in that trade.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator, Are there no ships of American registry in the coastwise trade on the Gulf?

Mr. FOSTER. There may be in the coastwise trade; I am not informed. But I am positively informed that there is not an American ship there that can be used for this purpose.

Now, Mr. President, this being the information furnished me, I called upon the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, whom I know to be an absolutely fair and just member of this body, and laid before him very briefly the information I had secured upon this subject. He very frankly stated to me that it was not the purpose of the joint resolution to do any injustice to any of the ports. After some consultation he suggested that it would be well to exclude Gulf ports, or that he had no objection to such an amendment.

I then had a conference with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] and the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] with a view of securing an amendment to the resolution excluding the Gulf ports from the operations of the resolution. But in our consultation the question arose of ports being in the South Atlantic similarly situated, and then our amendment was written in the form in which it was presented to the Senate a few days ago and accepted by the chairman of the committee. The latter clause of this amendment we all thought protected not only the port of New Orleans, but any other port similarly situated.

Unless some amendment is made to the joint resolution excluding its operation from these ports it will not only deprive these ports of the shipments made to the Panama Canal Commission, but will practically cripple their trade in other directions. Unless some such amendment is provided in the joint resolution there is not a stick of lumber from the vast forests of Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, or Georgia, that can be shipped to the Commission. There is not a crate of vegetables or of fruit; there is not a spade or a shovel or a hoe manufactured in the great Middle West; there is not a steam plow or a steam shovel that can find its way to the canal through a single Gulf port unless some such provision is incorporated in the pending measure excluding those ports from its operation.

I know it is not the purpose of the friends of this measure to pass a joint resolution of this kind. I can not for a moment imagine that it is the object and purpose of the friends of the shipping interests to inflict such a wrong and injustice upon such a vast portion of this country.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if he is not mistaken in his statement that there are no registered vessels in Louisiana engaged in the foreign trade. I notice by the report of the Commissioner of Navigation that there are ten vessels registered, documented in the custom-house for Louisiana, with 8,237 tons, there being 185 that are enrolled. I suppose these documented ten vessels of 8,000 tons measurement, with a capacity of nearly that, are engaged in the foreign trade.

Mr. FOSTER. My statement was predicated upon the statement of the president of the Board of Trade of New Orleans.

Mr. PERKINS. I have the statement here——

Mr. FOSTER. But there is this fact, that there is not a ship under the American flag plying in this particular trade.

Mr. PERKINS. That is possible, and it is undoubtedly because there is no business at this time. But if our friends in Louisiana can furnish the cement and coal and other articles for use on the Isthmus, are there not available for this purpose these vessels which belong to the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Texas, and other Gulf States?

Mr. FOSTER. I am just stating to the Senate that the records of the office show that to the Panama Canal Commission alone shipments originating in the city of New Orleans amounting to over a million dollars were sent in foreign ships last year.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. I simply wish to ask the Senator if he finds any objection to the joint resolution with the amendment as now modified by the Senator from Mississippi. It seems to me that the amendment covers every possible phase of this case, and protects not only the Gulf section, but the Pacific coast section. It provides, in effect, as I have just read it, that if there are no American vessels at any of these ports available and adequate to the service, the joint resolution shall not apply to any such ports, and foreign vessels may be used. It seems to me, with that amendment of the Senator from Mississippi as corrected, every section of the country is protected.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FOSTER. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I want to ask the Senator from Washington a question for information. I do not understand that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi has yet been adopted, or even accepted.

Mr. PILES. I do not so understand, either.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. McLAURIN. I understand the Senator from Maine is willing to accept it.

Mr. PILES. If it is acceptable and is accepted, it seems to me no one can make any complaint of the joint resolution. It protects all the interests of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be possible, but all I wish is to incorporate in the joint resolution an amendment that will unquestionably exclude from its provisions the Gulf ports, which can not avail themselves of the joint resolution and whose business will be crippled and destroyed by its enforcement.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator from Louisiana whether he thinks the ports could be specifically and by name excluded from the operation of the joint resolution under the Constitution?

Mr. HALE. Without raising the constitutional question?

Mr. FOSTER. I have thought a little of that objection, and I am not so certain that the amendment which I first offered excluding the Gulf ports is repugnant to that article of the Constitution.

Mr. FULTON. It certainly would be giving a preference to one of the ports or the other. It would certainly either be giving a preference to the Gulf ports or it would be giving a preference to the other ports. In my judgment, it would be giving a preference to the Gulf ports, and therefore, it seems to me, clearly would render the joint resolution unconstitutional.

Mr. FOSTER. I will state to the Senator that I will not stickle for the words "Gulf ports" or for any other phraseology of the amendment. I simply want to secure what I have been in my humble way trying to secure—an amendment which will protect these ports from the enforcement of the proposed law.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that I have been in perfect accord with him as I have understood his purpose in protecting these ports and sections of the country where vessels of the United States could not be secured at reasonable prices to do the carrying trade. But it seems to me that if the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi be accepted (and the Senator tells us he understands it will be), it will obviate any objection on that score.

Mr. FOSTER. It may, and I make no question it will——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. What we are trying to do, if we can, is to make progress. The Senator has just said that, as his original proposition might lay the whole matter open to the constitutional objection, he would be no stickler for that form of amendment. Now, just here will the Senator from Mississippi read the amendment as he has modified it, and which I think has been assented to, and let us see whether it does not, without in itself raising the constitutional question, cover every port either upon the Gulf or the Pacific or the easterly coast, without particularizing and excepting any and thus raising a constitutional question? Will the Senator read that?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

This resolution shall not apply to any port of the United States between which and the Isthmus of Panama there is no vessel owned by the United States nor by the Panama Railroad Company, nor vessel of the United States available, when needed, and adequate to carry the commerce offered between such port and the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. HALE. Certainly, Mr. President——

Mr. McLAURIN. I think that covers it.

Mr. HALE. That, if it be accepted, would cover every Gulf port, every Pacific port, unless there were vessels of the United States, that is merchant vessels, available for this trade and adequate for the transportation. The practical operation——

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me? What is a vessel, or what are vessels of the United States?

Mr. HALE. I think we have settled that.

Mr. CLAY. Would not that mean simply a vessel belonging to the United States?

Mr. HALE. Oh, no.

Mr. CLAY. Or does it mean a vessel of American registry?

Mr. HALE. The first clause in terms covers vessels owned by the United States.

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Now, that is one class. The next is the class owned by the Panama Railroad Company.

Mr. CLAY. And then, or vessels of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Or vessels of the United States. Now, that language has always been used in the statutes to cover merchant-marine vessels of the United States, owned in the United States, registered in the United States, not owned by the United States. I think there is no question about it, and the Senator need have no apprehension on that subject.

Mr. FULTON. I will say to the Senator that I think the statute now in existence defines a vessel of the United States as one owned by a citizen of the United States.

Mr. HALE. It does; and that is the reason——

Mr. CLAY. That would undoubtedly cover it.

Mr. HALE. That is the reason we have always used it.

Now, the practical operation would be this. Take a Pacific port: If there were vessels owned by citizens of the United States, or what are technically known as vessels of the United States, ready to enter this trade, adequate for the service and ready to make bids, that settles the question. If none such vessels appear, then under the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi the exception applies, and the transportation of these supplies from the port that does not furnish these competitors and bidders offering vessels of the United States, not owned by the United States, but of the United States, can be made in foreign vessels. It seems to me if my colleague accepts the amendment, that it is a solution, and that Senators who sought quite properly to protect their ports are amply secured under the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HALE. I hold the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator from Louisiana yields.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I want to ask the Senator from Maine a question. Would the words "when available, when needed," exclude any port of the Gulf under the amendment if a vessel was available in the port of Boston? I want to know what the word "available" means; what it applies to. There might be a vessel in the port of Boston which would be available in one sense, but it might just as well be in the Philippines, so far as business between Mobile and Panama is concerned.

Mr. HALE. What is the Senator's point, that a vessel owned in New Orleans——

Mr. FRYE. No; that one owned in Boston might be available there.

Mr. HALE. It would be the same if you apply it either way.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to know whether it means that a vessel may be available anywhere in the United States or must be available at the port.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that that is the very suggestion I was going to make when I had an opportunity.

Mr. HALE. I suppose in such matters our thought is led along as we progress. I suppose that the intention would be that it should be available at the port.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am perfectly content with this amendment if that is put in.

Mr. HALE. I supposed that is what it meant.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the Senator that the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama was the very one I intended to make, and if the words "at the port" are inserted I have no objection to the amendment, because it accomplishes the purpose.

Mr. HALE. I see no objection to embodying those words—"at the port."

Mr. FOSTER. Time is important, but I will, before I take my seat——

Mr. McLAURIN (to Mr. FOSTER). Will you accept it if the Senator from Maine puts in those words?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. McLAURIN (to Mr. FRYE). Are you willing to put in those words?

Mr. FRYE. If I can get a vote on this measure or get it into the Senate I am willing to do almost anything that will not destroy the measure absolutely. The Senator understood my objection to the insertion of the amendment to which I had agreed. It comes from the constitutional provision, and I can not see for the life of me why the language used does not conflict with the Constitution, and of course I do not want a joint resolution that is subject to that objection.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask a question? Does not the language now proposed conflict with the Constitution?

Mr. FRYE. I do not think it does.

Mr. TELLER. I think it does, and I want to have a few minutes to say so before we vote on the joint resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. Knowing the desire of the Senator from Maine to get a vote on this measure, if possible, I shall close my remarks with the statement that I am not willing to accede to the proposition that this amendment excluding the ports is repugnant to that article of the Constitution which has been quoted, because I believe that this measure gives a preference to certain classes of ships rather than to one port over the other.

Mr. McLAURIN. I then offer the amendment——

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator please withhold his amendment? An amendment, offered by the Senator from Louisiana, has been agreed to in Committee of the Whole. When the measure is reported to the Senate I will ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment, as it was heretofore agreed to, offered by the Senator from Louisiana, and then this amendment will be in order in the Senate.

Mr. McLAURIN. The same result can be obtained by moving to reconsider.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. McLAURIN. By moving to reconsider the amendment and let this come in. Let it go into the Senate right.

Mr. HALE. That is the better way.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is the better way.

Mr. FRYE. That can be done.

Mr. FOSTER. That will be acceptable.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana was agreed to be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. McLAURIN. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi moves an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

This resolution shall not apply to any port of the United States between which and the Isthmus of Panama there is no vessel owned by the United States nor by the Panama Railroad Company, nor vessel of the United States available at any such port when needed and adequate to carry the commerce offered between such port and the Isthmus of Panama.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate, but I want to say a word or two on this subject.

I sympathize with those who are anxious to secure for the Gulf ports all the privileges they can. But I do not believe you can do it in this way. I want to read the provision of the Constitution, which is short:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to ports of one State over those of another.

It is said that if the joint resolution passes as it was introduced, it will cut out a large number of ports; more particularly, I suppose, we are thinking about the port of New Orleans. Suppose somebody should suggest that we insert "this act shall not apply to the port of New Orleans." I think every Senator here would say "you can not do that." I think everybody would agree to that. Can you, by a sweeping provision putting in a dozen or twenty ports not by name but by location, avoid just what would occur if you put in the port of New Orleans? I do not believe you can. I believe that is a preference, which is prohibited by the Constitution.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator indulge me for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will bear in mind that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is not based upon a distinction by locality. It does not seek by general phraseology to cover a certain part of our coasts when we could not cover it by specifying the ports, but only makes it apply on certain conditions, and which are not in any way governed by the locality.

Mr. TELLER. I will go a little further, then. Suppose we said the port of New Orleans shall not be subject to this bill, and thereupon somebody offers an amendment that it shall not be subject to this bill provided there are no ships in that port, does anyone believe that that would avoid the constitutional difficulty? It is not possible that it would.

Mr. HALE. No, undoubtedly; but this amendment applies to all ports.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know much about it; but I think I know as much as the rest.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. Suppose you have a resolution that restricts the transportation of material and equipment to American vessels, and there are only two ports in the United States that have American vessels.

Mr. TELLER. All right.

Mr. McLAURIN. Do you not make a distinction then and a preference in favor of those two ports?

Mr. TELLER. No, I do not think we do, because they can all acquire ships if they want to. Mr. President, it would be a very strong argument against adopting such a provision, as there is now, and a very strong argument against adopting this resolution that there is a large portion of the country that can not get any benefit under it and may be injured by it. Undoubtedly the greatest amount of material to be furnished for the Panama Canal will come from this section of the country. All the cement that is proposed to be used will probably come from the Mississippi Valley or farther down, possibly from Oklahoma.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is not that in the Mississippi Valley?

Mr. TELLER. It is in the Mississippi Valley, but it is at the extreme limit of the Mississippi Valley. I am talking more particularly of——

Mr. TILLMAN. The main stream?

Mr. TELLER. Of the States lying on the main stream. I think probably 90 per cent of the coal and everything will come from the ports that are interdicted if the joint resolution becomes a law without some modification. I understand we have a general law which allows everybody to ship their stuff in any kind of a vessel they choose. A man bringing his corn to New Orleans ships it in a foreign ship if he sees fit. Certainly no one will deny that it would be a preference given to other ports or a restriction upon New Orleans if we should say in every other port they might ship corn and wheat in a foreign ship but they should not ship it from New Orleans in that kind of a ship. I do not believe you would cure that difficulty if you would say you might do it provided there was no American ship ready.

Mr. President, this is a pretty difficult question, in my judgment. I shall be very glad myself to see some way by which you can avoid this difficulty. I have been taught to believe that what you can not do in the way of constitutional inhibitions directly you can not do indirectly, that what you can not do by a direct act you can not do by going round about and by a pretext.

The question in my mind is whether there is enough benefit going to come to the commerce of this country by passing this bill to pay for passing it. As to the Panama business, of course, so far as I am concerned, I have voted once or twice in the interest of securing as much as possible to the United States. I think we had a bill here two or three years ago which presented that question. I said then, and I say now, that about all the good we will get out of the Panama Canal will be from the stuff that we sell to the Government while we are building it.

I do not know, Mr. President, that that is very pertinent at this time, and I do not propose to go into it; but I am very much afraid if you undertake to do it the way you propose to do it you will find yourself against a constitutional provision.

It has been suggested in my hearing that this is giving a preference to ships. Mr. President, it is clearly giving a preference to ports in this case. Perhaps you might fix it in such a way that you would allow foreign ships to come into some ports where you exclude them from another port, or allow them to load in one port and exclude them from another, but I admit that I am not capable of drafting an amendment that would do that thing.

I want to vote for this measure if it can be modified so as to enable these ports to have the advantage of that trade. While I am as much as anyone in favor of protecting American shipping and giving American shipping an opportunity to put itself in better shape than it is now, I am not willing to vote for the measure unless I feel that we have a constitutional right to pass it. I am not willing to vote for it as it stands now.

Mr. President, the Government of the United States has undertaken a great big job in building the Panama Canal. If the Government of the United States applies the rule that it takes for the coastwise trade, why not apply it here against the Government of the United States.

I wanted to say a few words about the cement, but this part of the measure seems to be first, and it ought to be disposed of. Then I want to say a few words about the freight that will be furnished, where it will go, and where it will come from. I will not do it now, because that is not the pending proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think the amendment as adopted improves the situation, but I do not think it is sufficient to cover the difficulties which I suggested to the Senate yesterday. I want to say that I realize the anxiety of the friends of the joint resolution to have a vote upon it, and I trust that if the hour of 2 o'clock arrives before those of us who want a few words on the subject have completed what we have to say the time will be extended, so that Senators will not be disappointed in their desire to get a vote to-day. If that is not done, it will not be through opposition of mine.

I endeavored to point out yesterday to the Senate the fact that under the operation of the joint resolution it would be impossible for bidders, certainly under certain conditions, to make bids intelligently and with a certainty that it would not involve them in loss if those bids were accepted. The doubt which would be upon the mind of a bidder and the difficulty for him to bid intelligently on account of that doubt is in part removed by this amendment, but still, in practical operation, the difficulty is not entirely removed, and unless I am very grossly mistaken in that practical operation it would result in very great embarrassment to industries which affect the section from which I come when they propose to make bids for supplying the material for the construction of the canal.

As I stated yesterday, all the lumber, practically, and all of the cross-ties that will go into the construction of the canal and in the maintenance of the railroad must come from the Southern States on the Gulf and on the South Atlantic. So it is not a vague, indefinite suggestion that there may be some necessity for a practical consideration of this matter by people in that section, but it is one of direct, absolute certainty.

I want Senators for a moment to see how this will work practically. So far as concerns the cement producers, it is probably not one which would produce embarrassment with the amendment which has been adopted, for the reason that the amount of cement which is to be used is approximately known. It is a very large amount. It will probably be in the main furnished by one party, or if more than one party by parties acting in concert. The supply is such that it will continue in regular demand throughout the entire time of the construction of the canal, and, therefore, those who are interested in the cement production are in a position to make contracts looking to that entire supply with the full knowledge of the rate at which the supply will be required, and consequently with a full opportunity to make arrangements for its shipment, which will extend through a period of years, they being, as I said, either one party or parties acting in concert with each other.

But that is not the case when it comes to the lumber and the cross-tie supply, for the reason that the lumber would be furnished by a number of parties. It will be furnished in comparatively small quantities by different parties, each in small quantities; and, therefore, it is impossible for those engaged in the lumber supply and in the cross-tie supply to anticipate the exact contracts which they will be able to make in the future, or to anticipate whether their bids are going to be accepted, or whether their contracts will be of a nature which will enable them to make arrangements in the future for the continued service of a certain fleet of vessels, as it is in the case of the cement supply by reason of the different conditions which I have endeavored to suggest.

I hope I may have the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], because, of course, we know that what we do must be largely in the way of agreement here to-day so far as amendments are concerned. I want to suggest to Senators that even under the present amendment there will be practically a very grave difficulty unless the amendment which I am going to offer is accepted or shall be incorporated in the bill.

The amendment as it now reads provides, stated in short words, that the shipment shall be made by a ship of American registry, provided that ship is available. Of course that means available at the time the shipment is called for, at the time there is a demand for the vessel. The bid for the contract may be six months before it is possible for the contract to be fulfilled, before it is possible for the bidder to be in a position to carry out his contract, and at the time he makes his bid it is an impossibility for him to anticipate the conditions in a great many ports. It may not be in the port of New Orleans; it may not be as to cement shipments, because of the certainty which I have already stated, but as to lumber and cross-ties shipped from a dozen different ports it may be an impossibility and will be an impossibility as to most of these ports for one who desires to bid upon a contract for lumber or cross-ties to know whether, when the six months shall have run around and he will have had time to prepare to fill his contract, a vessel will be available or whether there will be no such vessel available.

Mr. HALE. Is not that true, and would it not be true in any transaction in which lumber—and I am as much interested in that as anybody—or ties are concerned? When a bid is to be made, whether it is the Government or a private contract, to be executed in the future, has not the bidder to take certain chances of conditions that will apply when he executes his contract?

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator, if he will permit me——

Mr. HALE. Can you do business without the bidder taking those risks, whatever they may be? Some things must be left to the course of trade.

Mr. BACON. That is a question very easily answered by anyone familiar with the lumber trade and with the cross-tie trade. The lumber trade is carried on now in the South as to the yellow pine lumber by shipments, either where it is to go along the coast on the coastwise vessels or where it is to go into foreign ports by foreign vessels. Those ships are constantly there for that purpose, and a man knows what the rates are. A man who is to ship lumber to South America knows what the rates are for transportation by foreign ships of lumber from the port of Brunswick, for instance, or the port of Savannah to a port in South America. He knows when he makes his bid that he is going to ship by a foreign vessel, and he knows what the charges are.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will let me answer his question before he propounds another one. He knows, by the customs of the trade and by the generally accepted and recognized rates when he makes a bid for lumber that he is to ship to South America, about what he will have to pay in the way of rates.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I trust the Senator will permit me to answer his question, and then I will yield to him with great pleasure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. FRYE. I hoped we might get through with the joint resolution, but I do not wish to interfere with Senators who have announced a purpose to speak. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is to speak and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] is to follow him. I will ask that the joint resolution may be taken up again for consideration after those speeches have been concluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution No. 40 be taken up for further consideration at the conclusion of the speeches by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Kentucky. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. LODGE. I had not intended, Mr. President, to consume any of the time of the Senate in discussing this measure. I was more than content to leave its explanation and defense in the hands of those who were charged with its preparation and report—far abler hands than mine. But two reasons have arisen which have made it seem necessary to me to explain very briefly why I support the bill and why I shall vote for it.

I presented to the Senate a day or two ago a protest of the Boston Chamber of Commerce against the bill. The Chamber of Commerce of Boston is composed of the most representative men engaged in our trade, our commerce, and our finance, and for their opinion and their wishes I have the highest respect. It is with the greatest diffidence that I venture to differ from them; but as I can not agree with them as to action upon this bill, it has seemed to me only proper that I should explain my reasons for failing to do so.

The other cause of my desiring to speak upon this bill is the fact that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], in his very able and most interesting speech, alluded to something I had said in a running debate not long ago. I think he misunderstood my position, and I desire to have the opportunity to restate it, which I shall do presently.

Mr. President, in preparing this bill the first question to be determined was precisely what the situation was with which we had to deal. There had been a great crisis or panic, as it is called, in the autumn, when a rapid decline of values in the stock market was followed by an acute stringency in the money market, by what is commonly referred to as a "currency famine." I do not care to enter now into a discussion of the causes of that panic. It is enough that we must postulate its existence as the foundation of the action which Congress was called upon to take.

There was at the time of the panic plenty of currency in the country, but it was withdrawn from circulation. Not only individuals hoarded, but the banks themselves hoarded currency in much larger masses than individuals, and ready money could not be procured. What was really lacking, however, was not currency, but confidence, which is always the case, or almost always the case, at such periods. Men hoard only what they believe will be scarce and difficult to obtain. When men feel or believe that there is an abundance of any given article the motive for hoarding it disappears. If men anticipate a lack of grain, which in some parts of the world is the cause of desolating famines, they hoard grain. If there is an arrest of coal production, the tendency of everybody is immediately to lay in a supply of coal and hoard it; and that which applies to all articles of use or value applies equally to currency. Therefore the first step to be taken to bring business conditions back to their normal state was to assure the people that there would be plenty of currency and that there was no reason for hoarding, for in that way alone could any advance be made toward the restoration of confidence. This was effected finally by the measures of the Government. Those measures were awkward, because we have no laws which give the Government any proper or well-defined powers for dealing with such a crisis; but however awkward and however extreme those measures of the Government have seemed, the issue of the Panama bonds and the promised issue of Treasury notes upon which more bank currency could have been issued served their purpose. In fact, they served their purpose so well that very few of the notes were actually issued. For as soon as the people saw or believed—and belief is the main thing—that they could get currency, they ceased to have any desire to keep it in their safes or in their pockets. These extreme measures were taken because no others were possible, and when Congress came together it was its duty, the strain having been relaxed in this way, to pass some measure which should prevent, if possible, a recurrence, not of crises in business or of declines of values—becaue those depend not upon the currency or the Government, but upon causes which lie much deeper—but to enact some legislation which would prevent, if possible, as I have said, a recurrence of this needless currency stringency, which would make it clear that at any such time currency could be obtained if it was needed in unusually large amounts.

There has been, I think, in the popular discussion of the events of last autumn, as well as in the discussion here, possibly, some confusion between capital and currency. Capital, speaking from the point of view of the political economist, and speaking strictly, is saved and accumulated labor. Currency is the medium of exchange. Congress can not increase capital—that is beyond the power of statutes—but it can increase currency, and it can render it by judicious legislation so elastic that it will respond to the needs of the moment, whatever they may be. The cause of the crisis, in my judgment, was the exhaustion of the world's reserve of capital by the enormous expansion of business and by the excessive demand which had been made on the savings of the world, savings designed for investment in new enterprises. That that was the case is recognized by the best English and French economists, and notably by M. Paul Leroy-Beaulieu. I will not delay the Senate by reading his statement, but I ask to have inserted at this point what he says in regard to the causes of the panic in the United States and elsewhere.

THE CAUSE OF THE CRISIS—DISREGARD OF THE RULE THAT CAPITAL LIMITS INDUSTRY.

Laurence Curtis writes as follows to the Boston News Bureau:

"In the early phases of the financial disturbances that later culminated in the 'Panic of 1907,' you kindly printed a communication from me in which I ventured to suggest that the difficulties were not caused by 'too much Roosevelt,' not by faulty currency, trust busting, or other factors then being blamed. I said: 'Why not boldly state that it is owing to general extravagance in our country, where the National Government, every State, every municipality, every railroad, every industrial corporation, and most individuals are spending beyond their means, and borrowing for their excesses without any idea whence to obtain funds for repaying their borrowings.' In confirmation of that opinion I now ask you to add the verdict of a high expert, Paul Leroy-Beaulieu, whose writings as long ago as last July in the Economiste Francais on the exhaustion of the world's capital reserves through the excessive inflation of credit and industry gave early warning of the state of affairs then developing, notably in America, but also in Europe. The same eminent authority has now reviewed the latter events in America of last October, which were the sequel to the conditions which he had previously pointed out."

NO ACCOUNT TAKEN OF WHAT WAS POSSIBLE.

He now says:

"It would be a great mistake to suppose that the crisis in the United States originated solely, or even principally, from lack of money in that country, or from defective organization of its banks. It is true that lack of currency elasticity may have helped on the troubles, and that the abuse of credits and the immoral management of certain banks and trust companies may have increased or propagated the panic. But the principal cause—one may, indeed, say the whole cause, for all the rest is merely accessory—of the crisis now raging in the United States, and which has, in a lesser degree, touched Germany, is industrial and financial megalomania and complete disregard of the well-established rule of political economy that capital limits industry. What has happened is that new enterprises have been started or old enterprises of speculation have been enlarged far beyond the sum total of available capital—that is, beyond the amount of capital actually produced by the savings of the whole civilized world.

"The error of the public at large consists in believing that even if there are manifest limits to the financial operations of individuals or of corporations, there are no limits to the financial activities of a great and prosperous nation. Reserves of capital have fallen short of the requirements of extravagant American demands. The industrial megalomania in the United States took no account of what was possible. It merely devoted itself to pushing up everything."

WAGES AS AN INSTANCE.

"And the same thing is true of labor. The extravagant American ideas no more kept in touch with the realities in matter of wages of labor than they did with the realities of capital, and this is how the spectacle has been presented of masons with wages of $8 a day at San Francisco and of other occupations approaching this in many other parts of the country.

"The debauch of extravagance was particularly indulged by the constructing companies and by the great American railways. Contracts were placed for the construction in the single year of 1907 of vast amounts of new work, and the companies prepared for such excesses by issues of securities to a simply stupendous amount.

"Here, then, is the real cause of the American crisis, and that cause is not lack of bank notes or of Government paper, nor the insufficiency of metallic money. Certain incidents have doubtless accentuated the debauch. If the fight of President Roosevelt against the trusts had not of itself been a contributing cause it must be confessed that certain excessive demonstrations in that attack and certain wholly eccentric financial penalties and legislative exactions imposed upon the great companies and railroads have done their part in intensifying the public mistrust against commercial or industrial companies of every nation.

THE PRESIDENT'S RÔLE.

"It is our opinion that the President has been fundamentally right in his campaign against trust abuses and against secret rebates of railways to their powerful clients. But his attacks might have been conducted not only with firmness but with a certain measure of restraint" (and absence of virulent vindictiveness). "It must be admitted that when an ignorant and impressionable public reads that the highest public authorities of the country" (President Roosevelt, Attorney-General Bonaparte, and governors and legislatures of certain States) "are constantly in their public utterances applying to the chief of financial and commercial companies the appellation of robbers, the public not only experiences distrust, which, by itself, might be salutary but is goaded into senseless panic.

"But, after all is said, the truth of the whole matter is that in this panic the United States is simply paying the penalty for its extravagant expansion at a time when credit conditions were merely normal."

I hope that you will see fit to quote the above, and to allow me again to place the blame for our ills upon a state of affairs of which extravagance is the main cause in a great nation in which speculation has supplanted industry, and debt has supplanted thrift.

The currency famine or stringency which followed the general, steady, and finally rapid decline of values was the acute and aggravating symptom or result of the disease. It was not in itself the disease, but it made the disease worse and, as long as it lasted, prevented recovery. Now, the duty of Congress was to deal with the condition of the currency which invited not only such attacks, but led to a suspension of payments by the banks, and to try to make the condition of the currency so strong that in future it would be able to resist them. To do this we had to deal with the American banking system.

I do not care to go into details, but in order to reach the point which I desire to make I should like to sketch, historically, but very briefly, just the situation in which we found ourselves and the methods by which we arrived there. For forty of the first forty-six years of this Government we had a Bank of the United States, with its branch banks scattered through the country. Founded under the Administration of Washington, renewed under the Administration of Madison, this institution had performed its duties of a central bank with great success, and had met successfully all the difficulties which had arisen except in the great crisis of a foreign war. That bank, as all the world knows, was destroyed by General Jackson, who had many talents and many virtues, but aptitude for finance was not one of them. After he had wrecked the financial system of the United States, having sowed the wind, he left his successor, Mr. Van Buren, to reap the conventional crop, which Mr. Van Buren did not fail to harvest in 1837, when we had one of the most disastrous panics which this country has ever seen. The final result of Jackson's policy was that when the great struggle of the civil war came upon this country the Government had no financial system capable of dealing with the needs of the Government, and out of that condition came the system of national banks.

Thus the national banking system which Jackson had undertaken to destroy was forced back upon the country by the stern and relentless logic of events, and it came back shorn of what I have always believed to have been one of its best features—the central bank. At that time, when war broke upon the country, the United States Government had to raise enormous loans. Gold had disappeared. We were carrying on business and Government alike with an irredeemable paper currency and the United States bonds were therefore made the basis of the circulation. It was an ingenious scheme, and one which worked extremely well. It gave the bonds an immediate value for a certain defined purpose; it made them valuable to the banks, and the mass of loans was then so great that the bonds were plentiful, and the banks could take what they needed for circulation without materially affecting the price. As time has gone on, the debt has been largely paid off. The total amount of the bonds of the United States now outstanding is comparatively small. Compared to the wealth of the country it is a trifle. There is no country in the world which, in proportion to its wealth and resources, has so insignificant a debt as the United States. These bonds, therefore, being largely reduced in number, and the demand for currency increasing instead of diminishing, have advanced abnormally in price, because they have been needed by the banks in order to get their notes out at all. Therefore the price has advanced and the bonds of the Government, which ought to be the repository, in my opinion, for the savings of the people as the firmest security they could possibly have, command an excessive price, not only in our own markets, but in the markets of the world. Then, too, with the reduction of the debt, the bond basis has become rigid and inelastic. Now, in this condition sharply brought home to us by the disasters of last autumn, what was there that we could do? We could do one of two things: We could undertake to reform the banking laws altogether—and I think they ought to be reformed altogether—or we could pass a limited measure to meet the immediate exigency and emergency.

It is commonly said that our banking system is a patchwork. Granted that it is. It was the outcome of a war. It has been amended from time to time to meet difficulties and exigencies as they have arisen. It has not been constructed as a coherent and scientific system all by one act. Admitting that it is a patchwork, in dealing with a patchwork you can add another patch; you can "stop a hole to keep the wind away," or you can destroy and remake. You can destroy your patchwork and put in its place one clean, coherent, and uniform piece, or you can patch it once more; but you can not do both at once. Yet that is precisely what many people seem to think ought to be done now, and many of the criticisms are directed against this bill on the ground that it is not a complete reform of the banking system; which is exactly what it does not pretend to be. There is no criticism at once more unfair and more inept than that which assails a measure for not doing what it does not undertake to do. This bill is an effort, and a well-considered one, to meet an existing exigency, to meet it so as to prevent a recurrence of the emergency which has called it into being, and it neither claims nor attempts to be more.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Not in the least.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does not the Senator think that a comprehensive and scientific measure, comprising the whole of our financial system, would be a desirable thing?

Mr. LODGE. Most desirable.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Rather than the patchwork which the Senator says exists?

Mr. LODGE. It would be most desirable.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The second question—and I ask purely for information—is whether, in the Senator's opinion, the adding of this additional patch will not put off the day when it will be possible for us to take this inevitable matter up for final disposition?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it will postpone the day at all, and I will, in a few moments, come to the very point the Senator has made.

Mr. President, it is not difficult to sketch out a perfect banking system according to the taste and fancy of the sketcher. I am led to this thought because I stumbled the other day by mere accident on an article by an eminent professor of economics in regard to this bill, and it led me to certain reflections which I am going to take the liberty of confiding briefly to the Senate.

Any professor of economics can sit down in his library and put into an article in a few hours a perfect system, according to his own ideas, for the banking of this country, and he can join with it sneers at the ignorance of public men who are trying not to put a system into an article, but to put it into law, which is a very different proposition. I have the most profound veneration for the great thinkers, few and rare indeed, who from the solitude of their libraries have guided human thought and moved the world. But for the little thinkers who have only thought and never have faced the world of men and action I have less reverence for. I have observed with Shakespeare that "conceit in weakest bodies strongest works." The article to which I refer criticises the incapacity of those who were connected with the preparation of this bill, and the article shows on its face, it seems to me, that the author can hardly have read the bill which he criticises. He speaks of the ignorance of its author in a way which reveals his own ignorance, as a great patch of snow in an open space in the woods will accentuate and throw into relief the beauty of the landscape and make the darkness of the forest visible. It is a delightful way of making a banking system just to sit down in your library and work it out, go over it, and see if you can find objections to it. You find none; then you show it to a few friends; you hear their objections, and you meet them or dispose of them; then you launch it into space, and there it has to meet every objection to be found in the whole world, which is a very different proposition. I myself can set forth in comparatively few sentences what I think is a perfect banking system; and I intend to do so in a few moments.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], in his speech the other day—and a very powerful and interesting speech it was—discussed some hasty and offhand remarks of mine in a running debate, which occurred, as I have already stated, in the Senate a short time ago. He destroyed a position, if he will permit me to say it, which I did not occupy, and I do not think he touched the position which I really occupy, although I am afraid he may differ from me on that also. He quoted Webster and Story and decisions of the Supreme Court with which I am familiar in order to demonstrate that it was within the power of the National Government not only to regulate and control the currency in the fullest sense, but to issue Government notes. That is a position, Mr. President, in which I fully agree and which I should not think of contesting; but in looking at what I said the other day I can not find anything which indicates that I did contest it. What I said was this:

> I should be very glad to see every dollar of Government notes withdrawn. I wish we did not have a dollar of Government notes afloat. I should like to see the Government confined to coining gold and silver and only issuing, if necessary, warehouse receipts against them. I do not believe in the Government being in the banking business. I do not understand how the Government can get paper out after it has printed it unless it either lends it or spends it. I know no other way by which it can put it out. The one method is pure inflation; the other is entering upon the business of loans and discounts, which no government should touch.

Mr. President, it is a very different thing to say that you do not believe that the Government should do something and to contend that it has not the power to do it. There are a great many things which the Government can do which I hope it never will do, such as taking over the ownership of railroads or telegraphs, for example. I do not doubt its power; but I have the gravest doubt of the expediency of such measures as those, for I believe they strike at principles, older than the Constitution, which lie at the bottom of American government as it was in the beginning and as it is established to-day.

With the views of Mr. Webster as quoted by the Senator from Texas I fully agree. I have some familiarity with the works of Webster, for I have given some study in the past to his biography and to his opinions. I think his great series of speeches on the Removal of Deposits, on the United States Bank, and on the Subtreasury are masterpieces. Webster to-day is quoted more than any American statesman, living or dead. It is not merely that he was a great lawyer or that he was a great master of statesmanship at home and abroad. There were other great lawyers in the country; other great debaters have been in the Senate both before and since. "Brave men were living before Agamemnon." But Webster had a power of stating his propositions, of illuminating the dryest subjects with a variety of illustration and with a wealth of metaphor and grave humor which has been given to very few men in the history of parliaments. He had also that greatest of all preservatives—a noble style—and therefore men quote him to-day as they quote nobody else. As "Stella" said of Swift, that "the Dean could write beautifully about a broomstick," so it may be said that Webster could display eloquence and imagination even when he discussed banks and subtreasuries. I think his views as to the powers of the Government over the currency were eminently sound, although at that time the question of the Government issuing paper was but little considered. Nevertheless I desire to point out some of the rare allusions which Mr. Webster made to that proposition. He was dealing almost exclusively with the question of bank currency. He was an advocate of a central bank. He believed in paper currency issued by banks under the regulation of the Government, but he had an unyielding hostility to the issuance of paper money by the Government. He always is very careful to distinguish between paper money and paper currency; between the notes of banks and the bits of paper which are made money by the fiat of the Government.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply desire to call the Senator's attention to this difference between the paper money of this day and the paper money of Mr. Webster's day. Nobody then believed that the Government could make the note, even of the United States, a legal tender, but we have progressed a long way over that view, and now the bank note is itself a legal tender for very many payments in this country. So that if the note of that time be treated as a mere promissory note, the different kind of notes of this time can not be treated as Mr. Webster treated the notes of that time.

Mr. LODGE. It was not proposed in those debates to make them full legal tender, but to make them receivable for dues and taxes, which is in a large degree practically the same thing; it is certainly the same in principle. In the course of the debates, which extended over many years, that proposition was brought forward, among others. But I will simply point out what Mr. Webster said. In his speech on the subtreasury in 1838 he says:

> Wherever paper is to circulate as subsidiary to coin, or as performing, in a greater or less degree, the function of coin, its regulation naturally belongs to the hands which hold the power over the coinage.

He uses, it will be observed, the word "regulation." He says further on, quoting the great Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun:

> He—

That is, Senator Calhoun—

> then proceeds to observe that there might be a sound and safe paper currency, founded on the credit of the Government exclusively.

I think I have heard that identical proposition made here since this debate began. This is the way Mr. Webster referred to Government paper in reply to that suggestion. I make no apology for reading it, because all that he says reads very well:

> In the first place, sir, I have suggested the complete union which it would form, if it were in itself practicable, between the political and the money power. The whole commerce of the country, indeed, under such a state of things, would be little more than a sort of incident to Treasury operations; rather a collateral emanation of the revenue system than a substantial and important branch of the public interest. I have referred, also, to its probable consequences upon that which the gentleman regards as so great an evil, and which he denominates "the centralization of commercial action."
> And now I pray you to consider, Mr. President, in the next place, what an admirable contrivance this would be to secure that economy in the expenses of the Government which the gentleman has so much at heart. Released from all necessity of taxation and from the consequent responsibility to the people; not called upon to regard at all the amount of annual income; having an authority to cause Treasury notes to issue whenever it pleases,
> "In multitudes, like which the populous North
> Poured never from her frozen loins, to pass
> Rhene, or the Danaw;"
> what admirable restraint would be imposed on Government! How doubly sure would assurance be made for it, that all its expenditures would be strictly limited to the absolute and indispensable wants and demands of the public service!
> But, sir, fortunately, very fortunately, a scheme so wild and which would be so mischievous is totally impracticable.

At an earlier day he said:

> Sir, I have no doubt—

This is from the speech on the Removal of the Deposits—

> Sir, I have no doubt if there are any persons in the country who have seriously wished for such an event as the extinction of all banks they have not, nevertheless, looked for the absence of all paper circulation. They have only looked for issues of paper from another quarter. We have already had distinct intimations that paper might be issued on the foundation of the revenue. The Treasury of the United States is intended to become the bank of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury is meant to be the great national banker. Sir, to say nothing of the crudity of such a notion, I may be allowed to make one observation upon it. We have heretofore heard much of the danger of consolidation and of the great and well-grounded fear of the union of all powers in this Government. Now, sir, when we shall be brought to the state of things in which all the circulating paper of the country shall be issued directly by the Treasury Department, under the immediate control of the Executive, we shall have consolidation with a witness.

I do not find any point, Mr. President, where I differ with Mr. Webster in his views of banking and currency. In setting out my own views, I wish, however, to say in advance that I lay no claim to being in any sense a financial expert. My observation has been that legislators who become welded to a system which is to cure all evils, and who devote themselves for years to the contemplation of a scheme which they have themselves invented, are very apt to grow unbalanced. It requires a very robust sanity of mind like that of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to deal habitually with financial questions without descending into something very like fanaticism. I have no desire to tread that "primrose path," for it seems to me that in "that way madness lies," and I do not care to encounter its perils. I speak simply as an outsider, and merely for the benefit of my own argument I am going to describe the system which I should like to see adopted in this country.

I repeat what I said the other day. I wish that the Government did not have a note out. I refer, of course, to the greenback. I wish that the Government issued nothing but gold and silver, and, if necessary, warehouse receipts, such as we now have in the form of gold and silver notes. I should like to see all the circulating notes of the country issued by the banks under strict Government control and regulation. I think I heard the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] say the other day, very epigrammatically and with great force, that it was the business of the Government to make money and of the banks to make notes. Those functions I should like to see separated and confined in that way. I should also like to see the bank circulation based on a gold reserve. It always appears to me that there is some confusion about the term "asset currency;" but before I come to that point let me enter one caveat. I am speaking in generalities. I am using generalizations, and I am quite aware of the great danger of a generalization. As the Frenchman said, "No generalization is completely true, not even this one." [Laughter.] Therefore, what I say is in mere outline. I am not attempting to fortify my position by details. I am trying merely to state the situation as I see it, and from that to deduce my reason for supporting this bill.

As I have said, I think there is some confusion in regard to asset currency. I saw it stated by one of the great capitalists of this country and of the world the other day that France and Germany and Scotland and Canada had asset-currency systems. I do not so understand. When I speak of an asset currency I do not mean a currency which has behind it a gold reserve. In Scotland, for instance, if I am correctly informed, there is a limited number of notes—£2,600,000, I believe—which can be issued without a gold reserve, but beyond that all the currency they use must have gold behind it.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it will not interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will state that the unsecured note circulation of Scotland is $2.60 per capita.

Mr. LODGE. That shows, Mr. President, how far removed the Scottish system, to take only one example, is from what is meant by asset currency, as I understand it. Asset currency, properly speaking, is a pure asset currency, a currency issued against the assets of the bank with no gold reserve, or only very small and practically merely nominal one. I am again going to borrow a sentence from the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], which I think puts the proposition of asset currency with remarkable terseness and force—that what it is desired to do with an asset currency is to borrow without interest and without security, and then to lend on interest and with security. An asset currency is a currency based solely on what are called "assets." Of course in the long run the assets of every bank are liable for all the engagements and obligations of the bank; but when we are treating of currency we are treating of notes which pass from hand to hand and which must have behind them either a bond reserve held by the Government, as ours is held, so that every man knows that, no matter what happens, the note of a failed bank is just as good as the note of the best bank in the country, or else you must put behind it an adequate gold reserve, so that the holder knows that if he wishes the money of the world he has nothing to do but to step into the bank and get it. As I have said, I believe in banks founded on a gold reserve like the banks of England and France. They always hold, as we all know, large quantities of bonds, not perhaps directly against their circulation, but so as to assure the ultimate value of the notes. As to meeting panics, the English system is to raise the rate of discount, and, if that fails, to suspend the bank act—that is, to suspend specie payments.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Bank of England issues $91,000,000, or thereabouts, of uncovered notes as against Government bonds, which they hold and are obliged to hold under the banking law of Great Britain. The Bank of France is required by law to hold $50,000,000 of the debt of France.

Mr. LODGE. As to dealing with panics, I think the English system is a rigid and severe one. In Germany they have met this difficulty by a taxed currency, which comes out under the pressure of great need for money and returns automatically the moment the rate of money lowers, because the tax makes it unprofitable and forces it out of circulation. I believe that the German system in that respect is sound. I also believe—and here I shall have probably very few to agree with me—that our system of small notes is a thoroughly bad one, bad financially, bad educationally, and most unhealthy and promotive of disease. I think the French system, with the lowest note equivalent to our $10, is the sound system, which makes the daily money, the money of the people, gold and silver. It is not only a way of anchoring the gold and silver in the country, but it teaches the people of a country to believe that gold and silver are the only true form and the only really valuable form of money. I would also have a central bank, with Government directors and absolute Government control.

Such in outline is my plan. It is very easily stated. It involves, however, like most easily stated plans, a complete remodeling and reform of our entire banking system. We have got into the habit in this country of making bonds the basis of our circulation. We have a long-established bank system. I do not believe you can reform and remodel it in one session, probably not in one Congress. I think the events of last autumn and the debates which have occurred here will lead to such a reform of our banking system as we ought to have. But we ought also to have something which will carry us over the interval before Congress can perfect what I should regard as a proper system. Therefore it has seemed to me that by the very force of events we were thrown back on a temporary measure, a new patch, if you please, in the old patchwork. To do nothing would have invited a recurrence of what happened last autumn. For this reason, the committee wisely, in my judgment, decided on a measure, the best they could devise, to ward off this danger and give us time for a systematic and thorough reform.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], one of the best financiers in this country, versed not only in the details which press upon us at this moment, but in the broad and fundamental principles of banking, was charged with the duty of preparing this measure. He was not asked to sit down and write out what he thought would make a perfect banking system and then publish it in an article. He could do that as easily as a professor of economics. He could do it as easily as I have just done it, and he could do it far better. He could have done the much more difficult thing which the professor of economics could not do. He could have put his ideally perfect system into law and brought in a measure here which would have embodied it in its practical workings. But his actual task was infinitely more difficult even than that. Unless he was prepared to have all legislation fail, he had to think out a scheme which would satisfy the people that more currency could be had in an emergency, and so prevent in that emergency currency hoarding, with all its attendant disasters. He had not merely to put this into the shape of law; he had to fit it into the existing law, and that, let me say, is a work of extreme difficulty. It is easy enough to find gentlemen who can sketch systems of banking. It is very rare to find men who can not only put a banking measure into the shape of law, but fit a measure designed to meet an exigency into laws already upon the statute books. That requires not merely a knowledge of banking and banking systems, but the skill of a practical lawmaker and a familiarity with existing law which very few men possess.

Before I left Boston last November I had much talk with some of the bankers there in regard to the legislation which was required, and I asked one of the leading financiers of the city if he could not get the best bankers there to prepare a bill which in their opinion would meet the exigency we were called upon to deal with. At that time all the gentlemen who talked to me spoke with favor of what they called an "emergency currency," to prevent the recurrence of a crisis like that which had just happened, and with favor likewise of the German system of a taxed currency. Many of them said that they thought we ought to have a central bank, but they seemed to recognize that such a reorganization of our banking system was too much to undertake with any prospect of success at this session. I asked them to draw a bill for me. I asked and I asked again. I never got one single line of practical legislation. I said: "Give me the bill. I do not pretend to be an expert financier. I certainly do not feel capable of preparing a measure which shall embody your views. Give me the proposed law. I will introduce it and I will do everything that one man can do to forward it." I never got one single line. I think if the Senator from Rhode Island were to be cross-questioned on the point I have just made, it would be found that he had a not dissimilar experience in New York.

But there is still something more that the author of a law like this had to understand. He had to understand the varying views and prejudices and interests of this vast country, comparatively few of which are to be found in Wall street, but which are all represented here in Congress and all come here armed with votes. In a word, he had to know what could be done and what could not be done here in the Senate and the House, where the law has to be made, and this is a form of knowledge singularly rare among those not charged with responsibility, and, as a rule, it is not considered by such persons to be of much value. Therefore, having decided first that something must be done, and, second, that to undertake a complete reform at this time meant no legislation at all at this session, the pending bill was reported by the committee. The committee had to adapt their scheme to existing law. They could not go to a gold basis. They refused to enter the quagmire of asset currency. They had no choice but to take the basis to which the country was accustomed and upon which our present bank currency is based. Bonds are the basis of our present currency. But there are no more United States bonds practicably available; certainly no more sufficient in number to supply a great increase of circulation. What, then, did the committee do? They took as a further basis of circulation the bonds which are already authorized by Congress as security for Government deposits; and the act allowing the deposit of those new securities as the protection for United States deposits was passed with the general approbation of the financiers, of some of the very men who are now attacking this bill. Those bonds had been held good enough and without question by the whole country to secure the people's money in the form of Government deposits in national banks. If they are good enough security for Government deposits, why are they not good enough security for bank notes, if you are forced, as we are forced, to proceed upon a bond basis? The committee further adopted the German system of a taxed currency, which, as I have said, seems to me much better than the English system of raising discounts and suspending the bank act, which is equivalent to our system of issuing clearing-house certificates and suspending specie payments in that way.

I have heard the objection made that this new currency could not be got out in time. That seems to me largely mechanical. I see nothing in the bill to prevent its being got out almost immediately. It can all be made ready. It can come out on the demand of the banks. It can be but a matter of two or three days at the outside, and the main thing is the assurance that additional can be obtained when needed.

They speak about the hardship and the effect on the market of compelling the banks to buy bonds. The banks hold in their invested reserve at this moment over seven hundred million dollars of securities, two hundred million more than this bill calls for. They may need to shift their bonds somewhat in order to have bonds which will come within the limited provisions of this act. But if they had had last autumn the power proposed in this bill, there never would have been, in my judgment, that currency famine. The banks would have had enough bonds in their reserves to have issued sufficient currency to meet the exigency which was pressing upon the country.

I have also heard the objection made that the real trouble was in the lack of funds to loan. That is capital. You can not increase capital, although one wise man, whose writings I read somewhere the other day apropos of this bill, said that the Senate did not understand that these currency notes were not capital, and that the banks could not with them meet the demand for loans, which was the real trouble of last autumn. It is quite true Congress can not increase capital. It is equally true that it can increase currency. You can enable the banks to issue additional notes so as to pay their depositors and lend cash to those who need cash for cash payments; in this way relieve the strain on the resources of the banks, and above all stop that acute fear which comes to men when they find they can not get on demand the actual coin or the actual representative of the coin. The chief merit of this bill, to my mind, is that it gives assurance that in time of stress more currency can be had, and when a man knows that more currency can be had he stops hoarding, and then there is no currency stringency. There could not be a greater mark of the success of this bill than that nobody should ever take out any currency under it. It would demonstrate its efficacy in that way more surely than in any other.

The committee also refused, I am happy to say, to guarantee deposits. Mr. President, the subject of banking and currency is not one which calls for eloquence, even if I had it, or rhetoric, even if I could employ it. But I confess I should like to use both if I had them ready at command when I come to the question of guaranteeing deposits, for it seems to me that that goes further in a dangerous direction—which I, for one, greatly dread—than any proposition which has been made looking to the Government ownership of railroads or any other of those great businesses which are now carried on by private enterprise. It gave me, for one, Mr. President, very great satisfaction to listen to the vigorous eloquence with which the Senator from Texas the other day denounced the tendency toward socialistic measures on the one hand and the unrestrained accumulation of wealth by any methods and the lavish expenditure of it on the other. How could you go further toward socialism than to call upon the Government to guarantee deposits? If the Government is going to guarantee my deposit in a bank, why should it not guarantee my investment in a railroad or a mill? If the Government is going to guarantee the deposits in a bank, what becomes of your only safeguard against rampant speculation by the banks? Men put money into banks usually because they have confidence in the men who manage them. That is especially true among our smaller country banks. The banker is the man who commands the confidence of the community. Sometimes, unfortunately, as happens in every other department of life, that confidence is violated, that trust betrayed. But, as a rule, the conduct of the banks of this country has been scrupulously honest. You now propose, or some people propose, by establishing a Government guaranty, to take away the great safeguard of character, intelligence, and self-interest which exists. The banker would then say to a would-be depositor, "Give your money to me; no matter what I do, you can not lose it. It is all guaranteed." Yet, it would not even have the effect of stopping "runs." When men in times of crisis and panic want to get money out of a bank they want it then. They do not want to be told that they will get two-thirds or three-fourths of it some time later when the Government has arranged to pay. They want it at once. They want to be paid over the counter. You would not stop runs with guaranteed deposits, but you would offer a premium to every banker charged with the care of other people's money to enter into speculations, because he would know that, whatever happened, in the long run his depositors would be guarded by the Government.

I speak here of a pure Government guaranty. But there is also the scheme of a safety fund enforced by law. That is not so bad in its larger political and constitutional aspects as the proposition of the sole guaranty of the Government, but it is just as unsound financially in my opinion. It removes the necessary safeguards. It does not prevent runs. It increases speculation. And your safety fund is sure to be ludicrously inadequate. It was tried in New York in 1831. It involved so much taxation to maintain the safety fund that all the banks were weakened by it. Ten of the banks failed, and the whole safety fund was wiped out of existence by those ten banks alone. You can not make a safety fund which will protect over four billions of deposits; and if you put the naked Government guaranty behind them you lay upon the shoulders of the United States a burden which even this young Hercules of a nation could not sustain.

Mr. President, I have stated the situation as I have seen it. I have stated the conditions as I understand them. I have no misapprehension as to the nature of this bill. I am quite aware, and nobody is more fully aware than the distinguished author of the bill, that it is not a complete reform of the banking system. But I shall vote for the bill because I am not willing to let this session end without some honest attempt at legislation. I will not take nor will I share in any such grave responsibility as would be imposed by preventing any legislation at all. I want the Senate to pass the bill and give the House an opportunity at least to act upon it. We may not bring exactly the same measure out of conference, but I can not but believe that we shall bring out of conference and to final enactment a useful measure—one which will be of value to the country in the precise circumstances which now exist.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LODGE. I shall finish in a monment, but I yield

Mr. KNOX. Before the Senator from Massachusetts closes I desire to call his attention to the fact that the safety fund, so called, in the State of New York in 1831 was never designed to secure deposits at all. It was only by the accident of the draftsman of the so-called "safety-fund bill," who put in the words "debts of the bank," without distinguishing between the liability to a depositor and the liability to a note holder, that it ever was held to be a fund which covered deposits. It is not only true that the failure of those ten banks wiped out the entire safety fund, so called, but it mortgaged all possible accumulations under it for over eighteen years.

Mr. LODGE. I am much obliged to the Senator from Pennsylvania. My statement, then, was not incorrect.

Mr. KNOX. Not at all; but it did not go far enough.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall vote for the bill not because it is a reform of the banking system or embodies my idea of what that reform should be, but because it is the best that we can do under existing conditions. I believe it will give us time to secure a thorough reform of the banking system, which will need much debate here, great labors to perfect, a wide public discussion, and much education of public opinion, which at the present moment seems to me to be in a somewhat confused state in regard to banking legislation.

I have no patience with the objection that this bill does not provide sufficient profits for the banks. In my judgment, Mr. President, that is really the underlying cause of all the opposition which has spread and grown lately toward this bill. The banks looked it over and could not see any place in it which promised increased banking profits. As bankers are human, they felt disappointed and fell to criticising and objecting. Now, nobody wishes the banks to be greatly prosperous more heartily than I do, but I think it has been stated here, and stated correctly, that their average earnings last year were 13 per cent. I can not therefore think that they are suffering. The purpose of this bill, however, as I understand it, is not to provide profits for the banks, but to try to assure, in a measure at least, the business of the country against a recurrence of a terrible currency stringency. If it does that, it will accomplish its whole purpose. And the banks should be the first to aid in that, even if it does not promise them any additional profits.

I believe, as I have said, that the bill will serve its purpose and prevent a recurrence of the stringency of last year. I think it will operate beneficently upon public confidence. I think if it passes business confidence will gather strength. This bill will tend to the restoration of confidence, and that is all that is needed. The Republic of the United States is in no danger of ruin in a business or in any other way. The resources of the country are greater than they ever were before. The energy of the people, if it is not paralyzed by too much substitution of Government action for individual effort, if it is left to march along the old roads which it has followed from the days of small things to the present days of greatness—the road of independence, the road of individual enterprise, of determination to succeed in the battle of life—will assert itself. Let those old American habits continue to dominate in the United States and tread the doctrines of socialism under foot. The wealth of the world is here in our soil, in our mines, in our factories. This decline of values is but a passing ripple on the surface of the great sea of American life and action, and all we need to do is first to try to prevent a recurrence of that alarm which so paralyzed business last autumn, then to aid in the restoration of public confidence, and lastly to perfect a banking system worthy of our time and country. I believe, Mr. President, that this bill will tend strongly in that direction and serve our initial and immediate purpose. I believe it will bring back in a large measure the confidence which has been impaired and help to set the great car of American business moving once more along the pathway of triumphal progress which it has followed for more than a century.

Mr. PAYNTER obtained the floor.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PAYNTER. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Massachusetts spoke of the banks having now $700,000,000 of bonds. Is the Senator advised of the character of those bonds?

Mr. LODGE. I am not. I know only the gross amount which they hold, not as reserve, but in which part of their reserve is invested, as I understand.

Mr. ALDRICH. The banks have $185,000,000 in bonds of the precise character provided for in this bill and which are held to secure Government deposits. They are in addition to the $700,000,000. They have $705,000,000 of securities, and in addition $185,000,000 of bonds of the character described here.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PAYNTER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not desire that the question which I asked the Senator from Massachusetts very early in his admirable speech shall in any degree foreshadow what will be my vote upon this measure. But I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to this: The Senator from Massachusetts has indicated that he, like his great predecessor in the same office, Mr. Webster, is in favor of a central bank as the only and certainly the best solution. The Senator from Rhode Island entertains the same views. Every Senator with whom I have talked has expressed the same opinion. Every Congressman but one who has stated his opinions to me has held to the same views.

If, then, this is the general agreement and consensus of the competent—in which class I assign the Senator from Massachusetts to one of the most enviable positions—why should not we now begin this needed and, in the end, inevitable reform?

The further question was whether this measure, which may or may not be necessary for the moment, will not postpone that solution. Even if the pending measure were required at the present time, should not the great debate throughout the country, which the Senator says must occur on the proposition of a central bank, be started now instead of being delayed in its beginning for a year or two years? If the reform is essential and sure to come, why delay its beginning?

The situation has occurred to my mind, without having given the subject the study of the Senator from Massachusetts, that we are and have been in the position of the settler in Arkansas, in the famous story, who did not put a roof on his house when it rained because he could not, and who would not put a roof on his house when it did not rain because he need not.

The practical question is whether any measure of this kind may not delay the dawning of the inevitable day of that great work which nearly everybody concedes we ought to begin at once.

Mr. LODGE. Of course that must remain to a large extent a matter of opinion. My own opinion is, judging the conditions as I see them, that it would be impossible at this session to pass a comprehensive bill reforming our banking system.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think that is too clear for dispute. The question is whether we should not begin it.

Mr. LODGE. Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me that our duty is to meet the present emergency temporarily, if you please, but with the best measure we can. I do not believe that the passage of this measure will delay the reform in our banking system one hour, for I am confident that the debate which has arisen over it, the public discussion, and the events of last autumn have made it clear that that reform must come. I think that all the debates in Congress and all that we have read in the newspapers and all the discussions in the magazines show how unripe we yet are for the passage of a really simple, coherent, scientific, and effective system. I am very sure that the passage of this bill will not delay for one week that reform, which I desire as much as the Senator from Indiana, and I feel equally sure that it will be beneficial to the country while we await the preparation and enactment of a comprehensive reform of the banking system.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, if by participating in this debate after so short a service here I am committing a transgression against the unwritten law of the Senate, I promise that my offense shall be very small, as my remarks will be few. I would not have spoken except for my conviction that one of the proposed amendments is not based upon a sound principle, and if enacted into a law it would restrict the powers of the States, and would especially affect the banking interests of Kentucky. It has been said that—

> There is no principle on which the sensibilities of communities are so easily excited as that which acts upon the currency; none of which the States are so jealous as that which is restrictive of the exercise of sovereign power.

It is not my purpose to discuss in a general way the questions involved in the currency bill reported from the Finance Committee. They have been so thoroughly and ably discussed by other Senators that I could not hope to make any new suggestions or to repeat those which have been made in such a clear and forceful way as to aid in the elucidation of the problems here for solution. It is not my purpose to discuss the panic; neither will I endeavor to show that it should be designated as a bankers' or depositors' panic.

I will not attempt to add to the light which has been thrown upon the question of reserves in this discussion. It is my purpose to give briefly my reasons for voting against such amendments as may be offered to the bill looking to the insurance of deposits in national banks. If there is authority in the Constitution for making the proposed guaranty, I would still oppose the measure, because it is not just that the other taxpayers should contribute to or reimburse depositors for losses which they have sustained by placing their money in banks for safety or convenience.

In the second section of the amendment which is intended to be proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] the tax on the circulation of the national-bank associations, together with the interest accruing from the loan of the United States of notes contemplated by the first section of the amendment, shall go into a liquidation fund. If it is necessary to meet the demands of the liquidation fund an additional tax, not to exceed one-tenth of 1 per cent upon the average deposits in any one year, as shown by the regular reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, shall be added to this fund. The fund thus created shall be held for the immediate payment of depositors of insolvent banks. I will not summarize the bills which have been introduced looking to the insurance of deposits in national banks. The statement of the provisions of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma is sufficient for the purpose of my remarks.

It is proposed to take the tax paid by the national banks on their circulation and the interest accruing from the loan of United States notes, as stated above, and pay the depositors of insolvent national banks. Thus it will be seen that the tax paid into the Treasury is not to be used to pay the debts of the Government but the debts of persons who are unfortunate enough to place their money for safe-keeping or convenience in the banks that have been mismanaged.

If there is no authority in the Constitution for making this guaranty, then it is a violation of it to take the taxes and interest thus collected and apply them to debts which the Government was not authorized to contract. The political organization with which I am identified in substance has declared that it was legalized robbery for the Government to take money from the pockets of one citizen for the benefit of another citizen. To impose and collect a tax for public purposes and give it to an individual in payment of a private debt due by another can only be characterized as legalized robbery.

Presumably the tax that has been collected from the national banks is but a reasonable and fair imposition. The law imposing it has remained in force so long that it would appear to be so. If so, the banks should not be burdened with an additional tax to pay the debts due creditors of insolvent banks. Notwithstanding this, it is proposed to collect from these national banks an additional tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent upon their average deposits in any one year, as shown by their regular reports to the Comptroller of the Currency, and pay it to the unfortunate depositors. Doubtless in nine cases out of ten the bank which becomes insolvent has been the competitor of some other national bank in the same community which has been operated in a prudent, intelligent, and honest way; thus we are presented with the example of the successfully managed national bank, whose income has been diminished by reason of the competition of the mismanaged national banks, being required to contribute to pay the losses of the depositors of its competitors in business. The proposition strikes me as being wrong in principle and not calculated to create in the minds of the people much respect for the efforts of the Congress to deal justly with its citizens. The depositor, in placing his money in a bank which becomes insolvent, did not thereby render a public service entitling him to be recouped for losses which he may have incurred. It seems to me that there is no just principle upon which to base the right of the Government to take from the stockholders of successful national banks money sufficient to pay the losses of depositors in insolvent national banks.

These depositors did business with the competitors, and thus deprived the well-managed bank of profits that it could have made except for the competition in part created by the acts of the unfortunate depositors. Such a law would, in effect, deprive the well-managed banks from reaping the reward which their good management merited. It would not add to the vigilance and care of banks to have their depositors insured against loss. On the contrary, the tendency would be to make them more reckless in the management of the banks. The depositors would feel it would not be necessary for them to exercise any care in depositing their money, because if it was lost by the bank they would be protected by the Government.

The effect of such a law would be to increase greatly the value of the stock of the National Banking Associations, and the stock of State banks and trust companies would be correspondingly depreciated.

In view of the great advantage that national banks would have over State banks, persons will be tempted to organize new national banks with the hope of taking from the State banks and trust companies a large percentage of their business, and also because they would stand on an equal footing with the old national banks. Thus the number of banks would be increased and the cost of doing the banking business in various localities would be increased. It would result that the profits of the various banks would be lessened and the cost of doing business would be greatly increased. The effect of this would be to increase the hazard of conducting the banking business. Every community is interested in the banking business being conducted not only in an honest, but in an economical way. When their affairs are honestly managed and the profits are sufficient, the danger of failure is small. So if the cost of conducting the banking business in a community has been increased and the profits have been correspondingly decreased, it follows that the depositor's risk is increased.

If the Congress should enact the amendment into a law, it would be a declaration that the capital and accumulated surplus of banks and the well-established character and ability of their managers were not necessary to be considered by those who contemplated making deposits in them. It would be a notice to the banks that the prudence which they have heretofore shown by having an abundance of capital and an increasing surplus may be abandoned, as the insurance which the depositors have renders it unnecessary. The bankers are usually thrifty and they would at once begin to count increased profits to the stockholders by a reduction of the capitalization, and it would be done. This would weaken the banks.

These are some of the risks which must follow an act of Congress looking to the insurance of depositors against losses.

EFFECT ON STATE BANKS.

The alluring assurance that deposits in national banks are guaranteed by the Government would, in times of prosperity, induce many of the depositors of State banks, trust companies, and savings banks to withdraw their money therefrom and deposit it in national banks. These withdrawals from State banks, trust companies, and savings banks would cause serious losses. The States, independent of the National Government, have a right to authorize the organization and maintenance of banks of deposit and discount. They are just as useful as the national banks. They assist in putting money in circulation and in maintaining the successful conduct of commerce and various business enterprises. They satisfy a demand felt in every community that can not be met by national banks. They are authorized to loan money on long time, frequently with better security than that which the national banks under the law are required to take. Generally it suits the convenience of the farmers and many others better to borrow money from the State institutions than from national banks, for the reason that they can obtain the money on more favorable terms than they can from the national banks. There is an imperative necessity for supplying this class of people with money obtained from the State institutions.

It is just as important to conserve the interest of this class of people as it is of that class who are engaged in manufacturing and commercial enterprises, who furnish bills of exchange for discount, or borrow money and pledge stocks and bonds for it.

To aid in bringing about universal prosperity every business interest and condition must be considered in the enactment of laws.

The report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that there are 6,650 national banks, and 13,317 State banks and trust companies. The capital stock and surplus of these State institutions far exceed that of the national banks. The individual deposits are almost twice as great in these institutions as in the national banks. The mere statement of the facts shows how important it is to maintain them.

I am advised by the Comptroller of the Currency that there are 146 national banks in Kentucky with a capital of $16,254,000 and individual deposits amounting to $45,902,794, and that there are 408 State banks with a capital of $14,179,177 with individual deposits of $58,604,171; that there are 28 trust companies with a capital of $5,656,500 and individual deposits of $9,517,451.

This statement shows that there are three times as many State banks and trust companies in Kentucky as national banks, with many millions more capital than that of the national banks, and that the individual deposits exceed the individual deposits in national banks by $22,218,828.

It can be readily seen what a serious effect it would have upon these State institutions if deposits in national banks were insured. But it is stated that the deposits of State banks and trust companies must be guaranteed by the States, and thus put them upon an equal footing with national banks. This can not be done in Kentucky without an amendment to the constitution of the State. The State of Kentucky, the counties and municipalities therein, have had a very unhappy experience in the matter of engaging in business enterprises and in aiding others to do so. A great many counties in Kentucky have been burdened for half a century with enormous taxes by reason of the fact that they contracted debts in aiding certain enterprises. So burdensome has it been in some counties that they even refused to elect a tax collector, thus endeavoring to free themselves from the great burden imposed by their unfortunate undertakings.

So much were the people of Kentucky impressed with the danger of the State and its municipalities and counties becoming obligated in business enterprises that in section 117 of the constitution of 1891 it declared that the credit of the Commonwealth shall not be given, pledged, or loaned to any individual, company, corporation, association, municipality, or political subdivisions of the State, nor shall the Commonwealth become an owner or stockholder in or donate to any company, association, or corporation, nor shall the Commonwealth construct railroads or other highways.

In another section of the constitution it is provided that the Commonwealth shall not assume the debt of any county, municipal corporation, or political subdivision of the State unless such debt shall have been contracted to defend itself in time of war, to repel invasion, or suppress insurrection. It is provided in the constitution that the State shall not contract debts in excess of $500,000, except debts to repel invasion, or suppress insurrection, and provide for public defenses when hostilities are threatened.

Under the constitution taxes can only be levied and collected for public purposes, and the authority levying taxes is required to specify distinctly the purpose for which they are levied. A tax levied or collected for one purpose can never be devoted to another purpose. A tax levied and collected to pay the debts of an insolvent bank is certainly not levied for a public purpose. If it were believed to be desirable that the constitution should be amended for the purpose of allowing the State to guarantee deposits in State banks, the legislature which would be authorized to propose such an amendment would not assemble until 1910, and the proposed amendment could not be ratified until the general election for members of the house of representatives, which would take place in November, 1912. Therefore it will be seen that it would take four years for the State of Kentucky to be placed in a position, by taxation or otherwise, to insure deposits in her banking institutions. In the meantime the mischief would have been accomplished. The State banks would have been put out of business or seriously affected. No doubt many other States have provisions in their constitutions similar to those of Kentucky.

It is suggested that State banks could protect themselves by submitting to the control of the Federal law. This suggestion imports that the authority which is enjoyed by the State to permit the establishment of State banking institutions shall be, by coercion, surrendered by the State.

I am surprised that a suggestion of this kind should come from anyone who believes in maintaining the reserved rights of the States or is opposed to the centralization of power in the Federal Government. It would be difficult to imagine an act of Congress which would more greatly tend to impair the rights of the State than the one which would force the State to guarantee bank deposits. To thus force the State to act, perhaps against the judgment of a majority of its citizens, is the very essence of centralization.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who illumines every subject he discusses and however much it has been discussed, gives freshness to it by suggestion and argument. He is always candid. On the 3d instant, in his discussion of the pending measures, he said:

It becomes incumbent upon us as lawmakers, it seems to me, to see that the two banking systems of the country—the State system and the national system—are blended into one harmonious whole, in which the restrictions imposed upon banks and the requirements imposed upon banks as to capital and surplus will be substantially the same. How can this be accomplished? I suggest that it can be accomplished either by persuasion or by coercion. By persuasion by giving the State banks, in case they submit themselves to the supervision, the requirements, and the restrictions of the national banking act, the benefit of that act so far as emergency currency is required, and by that process they might be coaxed into a harmonious system of banking. Or they may be coerced by the national authority, which is supreme in so far as interstate commerce is concerned. All State banks are engaged in interstate commerce. The transaction by which a State railroad ships goods from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another is an interstate-commerce transaction, which subjects that corporation, State corporation though it be, to the control of the United States Government in matters of reports and accounts, in matters of interstate rates, and in matters relating to the public safety. We control such a road as to safety appliances. What difference is there between the transaction of transportation from the consignor in one State to the consignee in another and the transaction of exchange by which the consignee in the latter State ships the money which pays for the goods to the consignor in another State? It seems to me that interstate exchange is just as much a matter of national control under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution as is interstate transportation.

The Senator says that the States may be persuaded to surrender their rights to establish and control State banks, but if not they may be coerced. Certainly this is a bold assertion that the States do not possess the power to control the banks which they can create.

The Senator says power to coerce exists in the Federal Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution, that State banks are engaged in interstate commerce. This leads him to the conclusion that the State banks which deal in foreign bills of exchange or issue bills of exchange on their correspondents in other States are engaged in commerce and subject to the control of the Congress.

In making this statement I do not believe that the Senator has properly interpreted the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Nathan v. Louisiana (8 Howard, 73), wherein the court holds that a broker who deals in foreign bills of exchange was not engaged in commerce, but was simply supplying the instrumentality of commerce. The same principle was recognized in Paul v. Virginia (8 Wallace, 168), where the court holds that the issuing of fire, marine, and life insurance policies in one State and sending them to another to be delivered on payment of premiums is not interstate commerce. To the same effect are the cases of Hughes v. California (155 U. S., 648), and New York Life Insurance Company v. Cravens (178 U. S., 38).

The Supreme Court in the case of Briscoe v. The Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky (11 Peters, 257) held that a State has power to incorporate banks. The court also held in the Nathan case that a bill of exchange is neither an export nor an import; that the broker was not engaged in commerce, but was simply supplying an instrument of commerce. It further held that while the Federal Government had taxed bills of exchange, foreign and domestic, and promissory notes, it can no more regulate the commerce of a State than a State can regulate the commerce of the Federal Government. In my opinion, one who transmits money by a bill of exchange or the money itself is not engaged in commerce, but is simply supplying the instruments of commerce. Money is a medium of exchange—a circulating medium. If a State can create banks, the right to control them is a necessary incident to that right. It also necessarily follows that the Federal Government was not delegated the power to control them.

It is probable that the Supreme Court would hold that Congress does not have the authority by virtue of the commerce clause of the Constitution to control State banks. The scheme for all intents and purposes has the same effect, for it takes from the State the power to maintain banks and control them in its own way. It would be forced to apply the same method in its control of banks that the Federal Government would have them do.

If Congress should adopt the amendment to which I refer, it will have taken the initial step that will result in future legislation whereby Congress will attempt to assume the absolute authority to supervise and control the State banking institutions. It seems to me that those who believe in the preservation of the reserved rights of the State or who are opposed to centralization would hesitate before committing themselves to a policy that would ultimately deprive them of or greatly embarrass the States in the execution of a valuable power.

WOULD THE PURPOSE BE REALIZED?

The purpose of guaranteeing depositors against loss is to prevent panics and "runs" on banks. It is proposed that we enter upon a new scheme, so far as the Federal Government is authorized to act with reference to this matter. It is impossible for anyone to tell just what effect such a law would have during depression or panics upon the feelings and apprehension of persons who deposit their money in banks. When we are not suffering from a panic such a law would have the effect that I have pointed out, but no one can tell to what extent, if any, it would allay the apprehension and quiet the fears of the people during a business depression or a panic.

Depositors do not withdraw their money from banks solely because they are afraid of losing it, but because they are fearful that they can not get it when they make demands upon banks for it. The depositor would have that fear in a time of business depression or a panic, although he had an insurance against loss. That apprehension would precipitate the withdrawal of money from banks just as it has done in the past.

If reports should be circulated, as they surely would be, that banks were suspending payment or failing in different parts of the country, the knowledge that banks were liable for each other's deposits would cause great apprehension in the minds of depositors. I feel sure that there would be more apprehension among depositors in a time of business depression or panic if they knew that the bank in which they deposited their money was liable for the deposits of all other banks than they would have if they were compelled to look alone to the bank which they had trusted.

Will the slim prospect of preventing runs upon banks justify us in the enactment of a law that will greatly enhance the value of the stock of the national banks and depreciate the stocks and probably force out of business the State banks and trust companies and at the same time in doing so would practically destroy the power of the States to establish and control State banks and trust companies? We thus indirectly destroy a right which the States reserved. We would be guilty of an act tending strongly to centralization and furnish a precedent for future acts of like tendency or character. So far as I am concerned I am unwilling to vote for any measure which tends to minimize the powers of the States and aggrandize those of the Federal Government. I believe in preserving to the States all their reserved rights.

It is extremely unfortunate for Congress to attempt to despoil the power of the States and take from them the control which they are entitled to exercise. It is equally unfortunate whether the attempt is made to do so directly or by indirection.

Recently a distinguished Federal judge said:

> What is needed to-day is not that the Constitution shall be construed to mean precisely what it meant to Marshall or to Miller, Field, and Bradley, but that it shall be applied to present conditions by the same method and in the same spirit wherewith they applied it to the conditions of their times.

The same judge said:

> Centralization has already taken place out there in the world of commerce and industry. The question remaining is: Shall the Government take cognizance of the fact?

Shall the Congress answer the inquiry in the affirmative, and recognize that centralization has taken place in the world of commerce, and then take a step which strongly tends to the centralization of power? Is it either wise or safe to do so, in view of the growing sentiment to regard limitations on the Federal Government as productive of more harm than good?

I deny that there can be an equivalent for the deprivation of the States of the valuable power which they enjoy. The consideration promised, in comparison with the tremendous sacrifice we will make, is as paltry as the one which Esau received for his birthright.

SO-CALLED SPECULATION IN TOBACCO.

In conclusion I desire to advert to the remarks which the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] made with reference to what he denominated "pure speculation in tobacco." He said:

> In some counties of Kentucky the price of tobacco is now regulated by the shotgun. Night riders burn the barns and lash the backs of those who are on the other side of the market. The method is original and spectacular, but wholly speculative.

At the outset I want it understood that my purpose is not to criticise the Senator for his reference to barn burning and the destruction of property by those who are called "night riders." Their conduct can not be justified by anyone who respects the law or the rights of others. All should condemn their unlawful conduct. It makes against the cause which they espouse, and causes the loss of sympathy of the law-abiding people of Kentucky and elsewhere. There is another feature of the so-called "speculation in tobacco," to which I deem it proper to call the attention of the Senator from New York. It presents a picture with more lurid colors than the one drawn by him. It is one which appeals to our hearts and consciences, for it portrays oppressed and wronged men and their families.

A large per cent of the tobacco in Kentucky is raised by tenant farmers, aided by their children. These tenants have no opportunity to perform labor other than in the production of the crops of tobacco and in preparing them for market. So they depend almost entirely upon the tobacco crop for bread. The landowners furnish them with necessary supplies to produce the crops for the market. The use of the land and the supplies furnished the tenants make the landowners large investors in the crops. Of course, many of our farmers grow crops of tobacco by employing laborers to cultivate and house it.

Since the organization of the tobacco trust there is practically but one buyer on the market. Thus competition was destroyed and the growers were at the mercy of the trust. The consequence was that the price of tobacco was so low that the tenants did not receive half the compensation for their labor that they should have received, and the landowners did not receive a proper return for their outlay.

When the owner of the land cultivated it by the employment of labor, he likewise suffered a loss. Many of the tenants never performed much labor except in growing tobacco, and for that reason were not well fitted for entering other fields of employment. When they saw that they could not receive a fair compensation for their tobacco because competition had been stifled, a spirit of antagonism and rebellion arose within them. The result was that organizations were effected with a view of pooling their tobacco, and thus force the buyer to pay a reasonable price for it. A vast majority of the most reputable farmers in the State joined the organizations for mutual benefit and protection.

Whether those who destroyed property were members of the organizations I do not know; but it is certain that some persons who were infused with the spirit of antagonism to the secret forces that were destructive of the values of crops did unlawful acts of violence and destroyed property, for which they are condemned by the good citizens of Kentucky.

The burning of barns and warehouses is spectacular, but does it involve any more turpitude than it did for a body of men to organize a trust and thereby stifle competition, and thus, as it were, by force take for themselves from the helpless tobacco growers one-half the price of their product? While barn burning is wrong, it was but the reflex action of the unlawful invasion of the rights of the tobacco growers by the trust.

As I understand the revenue law, the tobacco grower can not stem and twist his tobacco and sell it to the consumer without paying a tax of 6 cents per pound. He can sell the natural leaf to a dealer, but when the dealer sells to a consumer then the tax of 6 cents per pound applies. If this tax could be removed from the tobacco growers, then they would have competitive markets for the tobacco. The tobacco trust could not dictate the price they should receive for it.

The House once, and perhaps twice, passed a bill granting this relief, and it will do so again; and if the Senate will concur the tobacco war will be over. The oppressed tobacco growers will feel that they can look to the future with hope, because they have been freed from the grasp of the grinding monopoly.

As the Senator from New York is taking more than a passing interest in the affairs of the splendid constituency which I have the honor in part to represent, I beg of him that he join me in an effort to convince our associates in the Chamber of the justice of the demand of the tobacco growers, that they be released from this burdensome tax, and thereby enable them to get a fair and living price for their products.

If he will use his great talents in this cause he will receive the gratitude and plaudits of the people of Kentucky. If the other Senators can find the time to make themselves familiar with the conditions of the tobacco growers, this session will not close without giving them a full measure of relief. That this may be done is my earnest desire.

REPEAL OF TAX ON LEAF TOBACCO.

Mr. FRYE obtained the floor.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous consent agreement Senate joint resolution No. 40, in reference to material for the construction of the Panama Canal, is now before the Senate. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Kentucky wants five minutes, and I will yield to him.

Mr. McCREARY. Not over ten, anyway.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, I shall only ask the attention of the Senate a few minutes.

Mr. President, I was attending a special meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs when the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] in his speech on the bill to amend the national banking laws used these words:

> In some counties of Kentucky the price of tobacco is now regulated by the shotgun. Night Riders burn the barns and lash the backs of those who are on the other side of the market. The method is original and spectacular, but wholly speculative.

"Distance lends enchantment to the view" of Senator DEPEW; but if he had given his attention to the stock gambling, the unprecedented speculation, the burdensome trusts, and the lawlessness of the State of New York, it seems to me it would have been more appropriate than to have wandered so far from the bill under consideration in order to criticise Kentucky.

There has been lawlessness in Kentucky, just as there has been lawlessness in New York. We have had Night Riders there; some tobacco warehouses have been burned; but the people generally condemn and denounce that kind of conduct. I regret very much such lawlessness, and I condemn it heartily. I am not here to justify it. Those men have made a great mistake; but the Senator from New York did not represent the case as fully as he should have done.

The governor of Kentucky has been making most earnest efforts to stop such lawlessness and to bring to punishment the men who have been engaged in it. He has sent a message to the legislature of Kentucky, and the legislature is now considering a bill to make the law more severe on such men. The governor of Kentucky has also ordered out the State guard in several places, and every effort is being made in Kentucky to stop this lawlessness, and I hope and believe it will cease. The trouble in Kentucky arises to a considerable extent out of the hostility felt against the American tobacco trust.

Mr. President, there are hundreds of trusts in this country, but the three greatest and most burdensome trusts are the Standard Oil Trust, with Rockefeller at the head of it; the beef trust, with the Armours at the head of it, and the American tobacco trust, with Duke at the head of it.

In Kentucky we not only produce more tobacco than any other State, but we produced last year more than one-third of all the tobacco produced in the United States. Kentucky produced last year 238,000,000 pounds of tobacco, and the whole amount in the United States was a little over 700,000,000 pounds. It is therefore very proper that Kentuckians should criticise and should be opposed to the conduct of Duke and others who are connected with the American tobacco trust.

A few years ago the American Tobacco Company acquired four-fifths of all the tobacco warehouses in the United States, and acquired at the same time a majority of the retail tobacco stores, costing them nearly $100,000,000. They then organized a trust and capitalized, as published, to the amount of $500,000,000. In Kentucky, as I have no doubt in other States, this trust dictated the price the farmer should receive for his tobacco. They allowed him for years only 6 to 8 cents per pound, which was not enough to pay him for producing it.

Forbearance ceased to be a virtue and the producers of tobacco felt that they ought to do something for themselves, and on that account an organization was effected there, known as the "Society of Equity." They have been fighting the American tobacco trust, and they have been doing all that they could to make the American tobacco trust deal with them justly and fairly. One plan adopted by them was to refuse to sell their crop and to put it in warehouses unless they could get a fair price. Another plan was to agree among themselves to produce no tobacco next year. Of course this has caused some excitement and produced some friction, because all the farmers did not go into it; but at the very bottom of all this trouble has been the American tobacco trust.

If we could have the relief that we have desired, the situation would be greatly benefited. What we need in Kentucky is the passage of the bill known as the bill to repeal the 6-cent tobacco tax on leaf tobacco. That bill passed the House of Representatives in the Fifty-eighth Congress, came to the Senate of the United States, and was referred to the Committee on Finance. I did all I could to have that bill reported in some shape from the Committee on Finance, but it was never reported. In the Fifty-ninth Congress the House of Representatives again passed a bill repealing the 6-cent tax on leaf tobacco. That bill also came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Finance, and again I went before the Committee on Finance and did what I could to have some action taken upon that bill; but the chairman made no report and the committee took no action. Out of order I made a short speech in the Senate and tried to induce the committee to report the bill, but I did not succeed.

If the tax of 6 cents per pound were removed from leaf tobacco a greater market in our country would be afforded. The farmers could sell it by retail to the thousands of people who would use it, and this would help destroy the trust, and it would force the trust to pay the farmer a living price for his tobacco.

There is nothing that grows out of the ground, except tobacco, upon which there is a direct tax. The planter who raises cotton, as my friend on my right [Mr. McLAURIN] and his constituents do in Mississippi, pick their cotton, gin it, and sell it without paying a tax. The farmer can raise his wheat, harvest it, send it to the mill, get his flour, and sell it, and there is no tax. The hemp grower can produce his hemp, gather it, and sell it without any tax; but when it comes to tobacco, the planter has to pay a burdensome tax.

Mr. President, the bill to repeal the 6-cent tax on leaf tobacco was written by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Hon. John W. Yerkes. It was sent to the House of Representatives, where it was introduced and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. That committee, through one of its members, Mr. DALZELL, reported it unanimously, and it was unanimously passed by the House of Representatives. It was passed twice by the House of Representatives—in the Fifty-eighth Congress and again in the Fifty-ninth. Both times, of course, it came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Finance, but no action was taken.

Under existing law all leaf tobacco sold in quantities less than a hogshead is liable to a 6-cent tax per pound, except when sold by the producer. It was declared in that bill which passed the House of Representatives twice—

> That unstemmed tobacco in the natural leaf and not manufactured or altered in any manner shall not be subject to any internal-revenue tax or charge of any kind whatsoever, and it shall be lawful for any person to buy and sell such unstemmed tobacco in the leaf without payment of tax of any kind.

There was no tax on leaf tobacco until a few years ago, and we who are advocating the repeal of the 6-cent tax on leaf tobacco are only asking to be relieved of a burdensome tax which for half a century was not imposed.

Mr. President, I felt that I wanted to say something in answer to what the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] said with regard to Kentucky, and I desired also to explain briefly the bill to repeal the 6-cent tobacco tax.

I want to say in conclusion that the people of Kentucky want law and order as much as do the people of any State. They condemn and denounce the conduct of the Night Riders and the men who have burned tobacco warehouses, but at the same time the tobacco growers in Kentucky are entitled to justice, and the burdensome and unjust tax of 6 cents per pound on leaf tobacco should be repealed.

MATERIAL FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, several Senators have expressed to me a wish that at this late hour in the day I should not ask to take up Senate joint resolution No. 40. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has completed his speech to-morrow the joint resolution be taken up for consideration and that a vote on it and all amendments be taken at some time during the afternoon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 40 at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to-morrow and that the Senate vote upon the amendments pending and to be offered and upon the joint resolution before adjournment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session, the doors were opened and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 13, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION.

Executive nomination received by the Senate March 12, 1908.

REGISTER OF THE LAND OFFICE.

George D. Orner, of Enid, Okla., now receiver of public moneys at Alva, to be register of the land office at Woodward, Okla., when the Alva and Woodward offices are consolidated under Executive order of February 17, 1908, vice Dick T. Morgan, resigned.

WITHDRAWAL.

Executive nomination withdrawn from the Senate March 12, 1908.

Fred Slocum to be postmaster at Caro, in the State of Michigan.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate, March 12, 1908.

CONSUL-GENERAL.

Benjamin H. Ridgely, of Kentucky, to be consul-general of the United States of class 3 at Mexico, Mexico.

POSTMASTERS.

CALIFORNIA.

Minnie E. Chalmers to be postmaster at Niles, Alameda County, Cal.

COLORADO.

James L. Moorhead to be postmaster at Boulder, Boulder County, Colo.

FLORIDA.

George B. Patterson to be postmaster at Key West, Monroe County, Fla.

ILLINOIS.

William T. Thorp to be postmaster at Litchfield, Montgomery County, Ill.

LOUISIANA.

Stephen F. Steere to be postmaster at Shreveport, Caddo Parish, La.

MAINE.

Melville J. Allen to be postmaster at Cherryfield, Washington County, Me.

John Harkness to be postmaster at Rockport, Knox County, Me.

UTAH.

Lorenzo Anderson to be postmaster at Brigham, Boxelder County, Utah.

RIGHT OF CAPTURE IN NAVAL WAR.

The injunction of secrecy was removed March 12, 1908, from a convention signed by the delegates of the United States to the second international peace conference, held at The Hague from June 15 to October 18, 1907, relative to certain restrictions with regard to the exercise of the right of capture in naval war.

DISCHARGING PROJECTILES FROM BALLOONS.

The injunction of secrecy was removed March 12, 1908, from a declaration signed by the delegates of the United States to the second international peace conference, held at The Hague from June 15 to October 18, 1907, prohibiting the discharge of projectiles and explosives from balloons.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 12, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SIDNEY BIEBER.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to make a statement. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. How much time, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Five or ten minutes—make it ten minutes.

Mr. MANN. Then ask for ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post of yesterday contained an item, published with big headlines, in relation to a paragraph contained in the public-buildings act of March 2, 1907.

That paragraph authorized the War Department to convey to Sidney Bieber certain lowlands on the Anacostia River, in the District of Columbia, at a price to be fixed by the Secretary of War upon consideration of all the circumstances. From the press reports the inference might easily be drawn that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had acted hastily in this matter. Therefore on behalf of said committee I desire to make a plain statement of facts, leaving it to the judgment of the House whether the legislation referred to was ill-considered.

In the spring of 1906 a bill introduced by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. ALLEN] was referred from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. During the preparation of the public-buildings act of that year that bill was taken up and considered. Mr. Bieber appeared before the full committee and stated that he had fallen heir to a piece of property in the location above stated, which, however, was worthless unless he was put in a position to purchase some adjoining tracts from the Government. He stated that these tracts were of no use to the Government and he was perfectly willing to pay the price which the War Department would deem proper under all the circumstances. Thereupon the committee referred the bill to the War Department, and in due time the bill was returned with its approval, and this explains the enactment of the first section to which reference is made.

In February, 1907, Mr. Bieber again appeared before the committee and asked for additional legislation which would enable him to purchase still another tract from the Government. In his statement before the subcommittee he made it plain that he had either to purchase more land or have the War Department authorized to repurchase that part which had been sold to him by the Government. He also stated that he had made an expenditure of money amounting to about $5,000, which would be absolutely lost unless he could secure this additional land. Since this contemplated a transaction exactly similar to the previous one the committee had every reason to believe that the War Department would approve it; hence the paragraph authorizing the sale was inserted. However, after the committee had passed upon the paragraph by unanimous vote I took the extra precaution of conferring with several members of the Committee on Appropriations who were more or less familiar with the location of these lands, and upon their suggestion the paragraph was altered in some minor details in order to still better safeguard the interests of the Government. No objection was heard from the War Department even after the passage of the bill by the House and no objection was raised in the other House when the bill was considered section by section.

While the members of the committee did not have time during the preparation of their large bill to visit the location of these lands, I was satisfied, and so were they, that since the whole matter was left to the War Department and even the price was to be fixed by that Department, the Congress would be on absolutely safe ground in enacting this legislation. We felt that the legislation authorized was nothing more or less than a legitimate sale of unused lands belonging to the Government and a legitimate purchase of them by a citizen on such terms as the agents of the Government themselves would deem proper. Though the terms of the paragraph not only authorized, but directed, the Secretary of War to sell and convey these lands, which, by the way, is the usual term employed in legislation of this character, it should be remembered that this still left the War Department full discretion for the reason that if from any cause the sale should be deemed inadvisable, the Department could place such a value and fix such a price upon the lands that the prospective purchaser would refuse to take advantage of the provision of law in question.

With these considerations in mind the committee had no misgiving whatever regarding the enactment of the legislation, and I was ready to defend it on the floor of the House.

This, I hope, will satisfy the Members of the House that the committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, has acted in perfect good faith in this matter and performed its duty in this particular instance to the best of its ability.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. No one would believe that the gentleman or any member of his committee would be guilty of any fraudulent practice or be affected by any corrupt motive, but can the gentleman explain how his committee reports a bill for the sale of property over which his committee has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter whatever?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the only objection that was made is made to the second paragraph and not to the first. The first had the full approval of the War Department, and the second was simply a continuation of the legislation already had and in pursuance of the action of the proper authorities of this House, which referred the bill from the District Committee to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for consideration.

Mr. MANN. It was a private bill. It may have been referred, for all that I know, by action of the House, but we all know how private bills are referred, and the ordinary reference of a private bill does not confer jurisdiction on the committee, and it ought not to assume jurisdiction when it knows that it has no jurisdiction of a private bill. The gentleman's committee would not think of authorizing the sale of land in Idaho because it has no jurisdiction. The gentleman would not think of his committee authorizing the sale of public lands anywhere else because it has no jurisdiction over it. But the gentleman brought in a bill which passes under the suspension of the rules practically by unanimous consent, and I think the gentleman's committee ought to be very careful about putting in provisions which the House can know nothing concerning and over which the committee has no jurisdiction.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I can assure my friend from Illinois that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is not hunting bills. We have about 850 to deal with, and if we could be relieved to any extent, in accordance with the rules of the House, of any of the work devolving upon us, we should all be very happy.

Mr. MANN. I have not the slightest doubt about that, but Mr. Bieber, or someone representing him in this case, may have sought for a bill where he could get his item through without due consideration in the House. The gentleman understands that I intend no reflection upon his committee, which I do not think is to be blamed in the matter.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri what the status of the case is now? This is a peculiar matter and I wish to know what is going to be done about it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 2915. An act for the relief of John P. Hunter;

H. R. 16073. An act to authorize the town of Edgecomb, Lincoln County, Me., to maintain a free bridge across the tide waters;

H. R. 14043. An act to provide for the extension of time within which homestead entrymen may establish their residence upon certain lands within the limits of the Huntley irrigation project, in the county of Yellowstone, in the State of Montana;

H. R. 16746. An act to authorize T. H. Friel or assigns to construct a dam across Mulberry Fork of the Black Warrior River;

H. R. 12803. An act allowing Chandler Bassett to perfect final proof in his homestead entry; and

H. R. 16749. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania, by the Liberty Bridge Company, approved March 2, 1907.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2326. An act to provide for the purchase of a site for the erection of a custom-house and Federal court building thereon at Wilmington, N. C.; and

S. 3507. An act to fix fees and costs in the probate court of the District of Columbia, and to provide for the collection and payment of the same, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 17703. An act to repeal section 4885 of the Revised Statutes and to substitute another section therefor; and

H. R. 15653. An act to increase the pension of widows of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1931) to grant certain land, part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Valentine for a site for a reservoir or tank to hold water to supply the public of said village.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 2326. An act to provide for the purchase of a site for the erection of a custom-house and Federal court building thereon at Wilmington, N. C.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 3507. An act to fix fees and costs in the probate court of the District of Columbia, and to provide for the collection and payment of the same, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR COMMITTEE ON REFORM IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service is hereby authorized during the Sixtieth Congress to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman takes his seat, what special call for activity is there upon the part of that committee at this session that will require printing and binding?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, the reason I introduced this resolution is that we have commenced the consideration of a bill reported by the so-called "Keep Commission" for the retirement of clerks to prevent superannuation in the service. In other words, the particular bill which we are considering now is what might be called a "compulsory savings bill," but it takes in the general subject of trying in some way to remedy the superannuation which is complained of. We have had several hearings upon it, and we wish to have them printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman expects to have hearings?

Mr. GILLETT. We have had hearings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18347, the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, with Mr. MANN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands when the committee rose last evening a point of order was pending upon the paragraph at the bottom of page 16 and on the top of page 17.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire if there was a point of order reserved against both of the provisos on page 17?

The CHAIRMAN. There was a point of order, as the Chair understands, reserved against the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there was also a point of order reserved against the last clause of the paragraph on page 17 by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON].

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the point of order against the paragraph will cover all points of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It might not be pressed if the other were sustained.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to dispose of these points of order. If I understand the parliamentary situation, there is a point or order against the entire paragraph beginning at line 19 on page 16, and ending with line 13 on page 17. Am I correct?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's understanding is correct.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is the point of order to which I wish to address myself.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to suggest to the gentleman and to the Chair that there are two points of order—one against the last proviso on page 17.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair should sustain the point of order against the paragraph, of course the paragraph goes out. The point of order made and reserved against the paragraph would include the point of order against any portion of the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] that he discuss first the point of order reserved against the portion of the paragraph. If that be sustained, it is possible that the other point would not be pressed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order against the entire paragraph can not be sustained; that is, I think it can not be. That, of course, being disposed of, the other point of order would be before the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair ascertain the situation. The Chair understands that the point of order was reserved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from New York whether he reserved the point of order upon the entire paragraph or upon the latter clause.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The RECORD shows, Mr. Chairman, that I reserved the point of order against the entire paragraph, and that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] reserved the point of order against the last clause, on page 17, in the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Indiana on the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to direct the attention of the Chair to the law authorizing the installation of pneumatic tubes. That law was passed April 21, 1902, and is found at page 9 of the general appropriation bill, which was passed at that date.

It is not, however, merely appropriation bill law. It is a statute which has in terms been fixed as permanent law. Under it authority is given under certain limitations, after inquiry, to make contracts for the pneumatic-tube service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if there is authority now for the making of contracts in cities other than those in which the service is now under contract?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Why, the general law, Mr. Chairman, authorizes the installation of pneumatic-tube service in any city so long as the expense of the service does not exceed 4 per cent of the gross receipts of the post-office, with a second limitation that the annual rental shall not exceed $17,000 per mile, except in cities having a less mileage than 3 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, the Chair would like to ask the gentleman whether that law confines the letting of contracts to the cities named in the bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It does not authorize contracts in any specified cities, but the law is not very long and I will read it to the Chair:

The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for a period not exceeding four years—

After which, by amendment, that was raised to ten years—after public advertisement once a week for a period of six consecutive weeks in not less than five newspapers, one of which shall be published in each city where the service is to be performed. That the contracts for this service shall be subject to the provisions of the postal laws and regulations relating to the letting of mail contracts, except as herein otherwise provided, and that no advertisement shall issue until after a careful investigation shall have been made as to the needs and practicability of such service and until a favorable report, in writing, shall have been submitted to the Postmaster-General by a commission of not less than three expert postal officials, to be named by him; nor shall such advertisement issue until in the judgment of the Postmaster-General the needs of the postal service are such as to justify the expenditure involved. Advertisements shall state in general terms only the requirements of the service and in form best calculated to invite competitive bidding.

That the Postmaster-General shall have the right to reject any and all bids; that no contract shall be awarded except to the lowest responsible bidder, tendering full and sufficient guaranties, to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, of his ability to perform satisfactory service, and such guaranties shall include an approval bond in double the amount of the bid.

That no contract shall be entered into in any city for the character of mail service herein provided which will create an aggregate annual rate of expenditure, including necessary power and labor to operate the tubes, and all other expenses of such service in excess of 4 per cent of the gross postal revenue of said city for the last preceding fiscal year.

That no contract shall be made in any city providing for 3 miles or more of double lines of tube which shall involve an expenditure in excess of $17,000 per mile per annum, and said compensation shall cover power, labor, and all operating expenses.

That the Postmaster-General shall not, prior to June 30, 1904, enter into contracts under the provisions of this act involving an annual expenditure in the aggregate in excess of $800,000; and thereafter only such contracts shall be made as may from time to time be provided for in the annual appropriation act for the postal service; and all provisions of law contrary to those herein contained are repealed.

Then fixing the rate.

Now, under that authority of law the Postmaster-General makes the inquiry and investigation, and upon his recommendation Congress makes the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask if the Postmaster-General now has authority to institute pneumatic-tube service in any city under the provision of law the gentleman has just quoted—whether this bill does not change his authority and limit him to certain cities? The item in the bill does not purport to be a limitation on the appropriation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the Chair refer to the first proviso?

The CHAIRMAN. The first proviso.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The first proviso does undoubtedly prohibit him from installing the service in any other cities than those named.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be a limitation upon his authority. It seems to the Chair if he has authority now, that would be a change of law, because it does not purport to be a limitation on this appropriation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is my judgment if the appropriation should be made the Postmaster-General would not need further direction than the general law which I have read, and without naming any cities could use that appropriation to install the service where he saw fit under the limitations of the 4 per cent gross receipts of the post-office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not called upon to express an opinion upon that subject now, because the item in the bill expressly limits that authority, if he now has it, that portion of the item clearly being subject to a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to a specific change in the law. The act to which the gentleman calls attention limits contracts to a period of four years, There is no authority now to make contracts for a period of ten years. This paragraph confers that authority upon the Postmasfer-General. That clearly is new legislation, because there is no such authority now conferred upon the Postmaster-General. I call the attention of the Chair to the language in the act of April 21, 1902, as follows:

The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for a period not exceeding four years.

A provision in the pending bill authorizes him to enter into contracts for periods not exceeding ten years.

Mr. STAFFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman from New York to the act providing appropriations for the postal service, passed two years ago, limiting the term for which the Postmaster-General could contract for this service. The item in question is in the following words:

For transmission of mail by pneumatic tube or other similar devices, $900,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts not exceeding in the aggregate $1,161,265.84, under the provisions of the law, for a period not exceeding ten years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That contract was expressly limited to that appropriation. It does not apply to this appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under that act, as I contend, Mr. Chairman, that expressly authorizes the Postmaster-General, meeting the objection of the gentleman from New York, to extend the period of contract. It is supplemental to the former law, wherein he had only authority to contract for a period of four years. The very nature of the provision indicates that it was permanent authorization and was intended to supersede the prior limitation. I respectfully submit that the Postmaster-General, so far as this service is concerned, has authority to-day under that provision to enter into contracts for a period of ten years, as that service is appropriated for by Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the provision read by the gentleman from Wisconsin is merely a limitation upon the appropriation made at that time. It stated the amount authorized in the appropriation; but there is no authority anywhere giving power permanently to make ten-year contracts. The authority to make contracts was specifically limited to four years in the act of April 21, 1902.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reiterate that prior to this enactment he had authority to contract for four years. Here is a later expression of Congress, giving the Postmaster-General authority to contract for ten years, and that law is at present on the statute books and operative.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

The paragraph under consideration to which a point of order has been made is the provision relating to the pneumatic-tube service.

Provided, That said service shall not be extended in any cities other than those in which the service is now under contract under authority of Congress, except the borough of Brooklyn, of the city of New York, and the cities of Baltimore, Md., Cincinnati, Ohio, Kansas City, Mo., Pittsburg, Pa., and San Francisco, Cal.

If that proviso is subject to the point of order, the paragraph containing it is subject to the point of order. If the Postmaster-General does not now have authority, the item would probably be subject to the point of order.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] informs the Chair, quoting the statute, that the Postmaster-General now has authority to extend the pneumatic-tube service anywhere in the country under certain conditions and regulations. This item would limit and affect the Postmaster-General's authority, and does not purport to be a limitation upon the appropriation, but purports to change the existing authority, if any, which the Postmaster-General now has to extend the pneumatic-tube service, and hence is a change of the existing law. For that reason the Chair must sustain the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I understand that takes out the paragraph from lines 18 on page 16 including line 13 on page 17.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Now, I offer the following amendment: Insert the language of the bill on page 16, beginning with line 19 and concluding with the word "year" on line 25.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 18, on page 16, insert:

"For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, $1,000,000; the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts not exceeding in the aggregate $1,388,759, under the provisions of the law, for a period not exceeding ten years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report to Congress not later than January 1, 1909, the feasibility and desirability of the Government purchasing the equipment for pneumatic-tube service and thereafter operating the same in the cities where such service is now in operation.

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Just a word on the amendment, Mr. Chairman. It is quite apparent that there is a great difference of opinion among Members, and honest opinions, based upon rather good arguments in many cases, relating to this pneumatic-tube service which is under contract in a number of cities to more or less advantage. The amendment which I have offered incurs no appropriation and no expense. I thought it might be wise to call upon the Postmaster-General to investigate upon his own motion the subject of the tube service, the feasibility and desirability of the Government buying, and reporting to Congress his views upon it. It would give us a great deal of information which we do not now possess. It was brought out in debate yesterday whether or not it would not be possible to authorize the contractors or directors of these companies which installed the service finally to turn the property over to the cities in which they were serving, or, as one Member suggested, that the Government might own them at the end of the term. This inquiry, by way of this amendment, is to ascertain such facts as the Postmaster-General may be able to secure, and submit to the House for its action. I can see no objection to the inquiry. It does not bind the House to do anything. It enables us to get some information which would be valuable, and I shall be very glad if it might be adopted.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is your amendment based at all upon a personal premise that it would be a good thing for the Government and profitable to the Government to own these tubes?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; I have no opinion on that. I have drafted this amendment since the debate of yesterday and the action throwing out of the bill the provision for the five smaller cities. I have done so in order that we might have this information to use for whatever its value may be when it has been obtained.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will not press his point of order, because I believe it is very essential for Congress to have some facts concerning the cost of operation and the cost of installation of this very expensive service. For a long time I have believed it would be far better for the Government to establish and operate these expensive plants, and my reason for so believing has been that the greatest cost of this service lies in the cost of the plant; that the capital invested is permanently invested, and that the plant should be so established that it will be enduring in its character. From instances called to my attention in traveling about the country where this service has been installed, I have found by reason of defective installation where mail has been destroyed because the tubes have been placed in marshy ground, without proper isolation from moisture. In other instances mail clerks have been maimed by reason of the poor construction; and it stands to reason that any investor for a ten-year period, like an investor in any other utility, where the time of operation is limited for a definite period, must consider, in estimating the lease value, that he will be reimbursed during those ten years for the value of the plant. That is undoubtedly the case here. It is the case where the owners of buildings leased for post-office purposes supply the furniture during the lease period. They, as a rule, add 10 per cent annually for the depreciation of the furniture in a ten-year lease.

Little expense is connected with the operation of these plants after they are once installed. In some instances the power that is necessary for operating them is provided right in the Government building. All these stations are connected with Government buildings, or with leased quarters in substations in some instances, except where they run to stations located at railroads. There can be no objection to government ownership of this utility, based on the claim that it will necessitate an expensive force for its maintenance. It should be established properly and adequately in the original instance, and I know no better place where that experiment should be tried out than in the city of Washington, where all the mail is received at one station; and by having pneumatic tubes to all the Government buildings, including the Capitol, the mail which is of such vital importance could be dispatched several hours quicker and the reply mail in many instances gain twelve hours in delivery than it is by the cumbersome method of delivery in vogue by means of the slow wagon service that each Department, including the House and Senate, has in bringing the mail from the central post-office to the respective Departments, for the mail would be assorted on the railway post-office and deposited in the pneumatic tube at the Union Station within a few minutes after arrival of the train and on its way to the different Departments.

The time of Mr. STAFFORD having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I know the gentleman is thoroughly familiar with this subject. That is the reason why I ask him this question: Has the gentleman any idea what the outlay of the Government would be if we purchased all the systems now in existence and built systems in the cities named in the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Although a commission to investigate this service made an inquiry into the service some eight or ten years ago, it failed to present any data whatsoever as to the cost which would be required to establish the plant. Many times in committee, since I have had the honor to serve on the subcommittee that has had the preparation of this bill, we have directed inquiries to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General as to whether he could furnish us with any estimate of cost, but he could not furnish any data, nor even an estimate; but it stands to reason that these contractors who invest their money on the contingency of a return for a limited period, of uncertain tenure, are going to charge adequate rental, to be reimbursed during that period for the cost of the plant.

The gentleman will see there is nothing to induce them to equip their plant for permanency. The case is parallel to that of the Government establishing post-office buildings, appraisers' buildings, projecting and supervising its river and harbor improvements, aids to navigation, and the like, rather than renting them, because by private contract they will not provide as good means of service as under public control and ownership.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has the gentleman any idea whether it would cost five millions, ten millions, twenty millions, or thirty millions to equip the larger cities of this Government with the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. STAFFORD. It all depends to what extend the tube service is going to be extended. The gentleman is well aware from his experience on the committee that there was an extension of double the service authorized in Philadelphia two years ago. Brooklyn to-day is clamoring for an extension of the pneumatic-tube service in the residential districts. Personally, I do not believe that the service should be extended to residential districts where deliveries and collections are few, but it should be limited to the congested business districts, which have frequent collections and which have need of expeditious mail service.

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman kindly enlighten the House as to the relative utility and value of the pneumatic-tube service, say in the great cities like New York and Philadelphia?

Mr. STAFFORD. As to the utility between these respective cities, they are strikingly in contrast, because in New York City it is of superior value on account of its peculiar location, and in Philadelphia the conditions are wanting to render it of so much value. The gentleman knows that in New York, because of the peculiar form of the island of Manhattan, business is centered along a narrow strip for a long distance, and it is difficult to get the mail from the far outlying postal stations to the main office, the other substations, and the railroad stations; and therefore this tube service is of great utility for the dispatch of the mail.

In Philadelphia, where the postal stations, like that at Tenth and Columbia avenue and at Snyder avenue, are in largely residential districts, the mail is not very heavy and the carrier force is limited and collections and delivery not so frequent as in the business districts, it is of doubtful expediency, because all these stations are also supplied with electric-car service; and, further, that since the establishment of this tube service no diminution has resulted in the service by the electric car. In my opinion the electric-car service is adequate to meet the needs of residential districts. But this pneumatic-tube service is of great utility in New York and Chicago for the business sections exclusively, but not for the residential districts.

Now, replying to the gentleman from Kansas, my colleague on the committee, as to the cost, I say that will depend on the extension of the service, how far it would be carried. Of course the proposition could run wild into the hundreds of millions, but I question whether that would ever be done. I think there is no more danger to fear that under the present policy of paying high rental it would be any more unduly extended than it would to provide for the permanent plant.

I repeat, that no other place is better suited to make such an experiment than right here in Washington where we have such need for the best service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WANGER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WANGER. What proportion of the mail from the Grand Central Station, New York, is delivered by pneumatic tubes and what part by the screen-wagon service?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not able to give the gentleman the data, but I will say that so much of the first-class mail as can be dispatched by the pneumatic tube that will expedite the delivery of the mail is sent to the respective postal stations. If the gentleman will examine the hearings of two or three years ago when we provided for building a new post-office building at the projected Grand Central Station and the new Pennsylvania station he will get some idea of what the plan is for the quick dispatch of the mails in New York City so as to relieve the congested condition of the main post-office and the congested condition of the postal service in general. Now, I hope after this presentation that the gentleman from Minnesota will see the urgent need of having this amendment adopted and of having some investigation made so that Congress can act intelligently upon the matter at the next session.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state for the information of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], in charge of this bill, that in making the point of order against this provision I do not do so on the ground of expense, as was suggested. I know the investigation may be made without any additional appropriation. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, there is anyone here who thinks seriously of the Government owning and operating any of the physical agencies employed in the transportation of the mail. I can see no greater reason for the Post-Office Department investigating the question of whether or not it would be advisable to own and operate this particular agency than there is for investigating the question of owning and operating any other agency. If we adopt this we should also adopt an amendment authorizing a report on the advisability of purchasing, owning, and operating all of the agencies employed in the transportation of the mail, including the horses, the mail wagons, the cars, and the railroads on which the mails are carried. This is new legislation, and for that reason I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For regulation, screen, or other wagon service, $1,700,000: Provided, That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to contract, for a term not exceeding four years from July 1, 1908, by either screen-wagon or underground electric-car service in the city of Chicago, Ill.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I want to ask the gentleman a question. Does he think it advisable to give this authorization without any limit or suggestion of cost, which may be expended for the particular service?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the situation in Chicago is just this: There is a contract there now for the carrying of the mail by tunnel service. That was carried in the former bill under the item for the electric and cable car service. That contract will expire on the 30th of June next, and a new contract must be made. Negotiations are now pending. We transferred the item to the screen-wagon service in order to involve the alternative of either a contract by the screen-wagon or tunnel service.

If we fix a maximum amount, it will be taken as notice that that maximum amount will be considered by Congress as a proper amount for the Government to make the contract for. Supposing, for instance, we should say not to exceed $200,000. It is utterly impossible to get the service for $200,000. Supposing you should say not to exceed $400,000. Then that would be considered as notice that so far as Congress was concerned we were quite willing they should pay $400,000, and the chances are that the contract would be made no lower. Leaving it entirely within the discretion of the Department, where we know under the investigations thus far made that it will either be a fair and reasonable amount or will be by screen-wagon service, the committee felt that it would not be necessary to fix the limit.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I am fully persuaded of the importance of this tunnel service if it can be secured on reasonable terms, and having every confidence in the distinguished gentleman who is the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, as well as the Postmaster-General, I make no point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mail bags, cord fasteners, label cases, and labor and material necessary for manufacture and repairing equipment, and for incidental expenses pertaining thereto, $500,000: Provided, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to use so much of the sum, not exceeding $4,500, as may be deemed necessary for the purchase of material and the manufacture of such small quantities of distinctive equipment as may be required by other Executive Departments and for service in Alaska, Porto Rico, Philippine Islands, Hawaii, or other island possessions, and for such special equipment for testing and for other purposes in connection with the reduction in weight of mail pouches and sacks.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. I would like to have the gentleman in charge of the bill explain that provision.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the paragraph authorizes $4,500 for the manufacture of mail bags.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The proviso is new.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is the distinctive equipment. What kind of equipment does the gentleman intend the Government to purchase.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is largely in the nature of small mail bags that can be used by filling the entire bag with departmental mail, or mail for the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, Alaska, or Porto Rico, where a larger bag would not be required. It is in the interest of economy and not in the interest of extravagance.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not that, but I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the latitude allowed the Postmaster-General under that language is so wide that he can use that amount of money for any purpose in relation to equipment. It does not refer to mail sacks. If it is mail sacks, why does not the gentleman say so?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It refers to all the material and devices that go into the manufacture of the mail bags. The Department is experimenting to ascertain if it may not be possible to have lighter material used—lighter locks, lighter straps, as well as lighter material in the bags themselves. They are experimenting with the use of aluminum instead of cast iron, so as to make the mail bags as light as possible. That is the general character of the experimental purpose authorizing this $4,500 expenditure. The remainder of the appropriation is entirely for the mail-bag repair.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, $44,000,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 18, by adding after the end of line 13, the words: "Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used to pay for the carrying in the mails of any malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors or intoxicating liquors of any kind."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment. It is contrary to existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would feel compelled to follow the ruling of the occupant of the chair yesterday, who ruled on an identical proposition and overruled the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the Chair will permit the statement, the gentleman who occupied the chair on yesterday sustained the point of order on an identically similar proposition. The point of order was overruled where the amendment was offered to an item of a bill which itself was subject to the point of order, but the point of order was sustained later by the Chair where it was offered to a provision of the bill which in itself was not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair remembers that he made an argument in favor of sustaining the point of order, and his recollection was that the Chair thereupon overruled the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am desirous of placing right the gentleman who occupied the chair at the time the ruling was made. I am not questioning the argument which the present occupant of the chair made at the time. I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On page 3289 of the RECORD is found the ruling made yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds upon examination that the recollection of the present occupant of the chair about the transaction of yesterday is correct, and that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] is in error. The RECORD shows, on page 3289, in the last column, what the decision of the Chair was upon the same proposition. The Chair feels constrained to overrule the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire to which paragraph of the bill the point of order was addressed?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was addressed to an amendment to a paragraph on page 16, lines 15 and 16.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I understood that the Chair sustained the point of order as to that paragraph. If I am in error on that, why, then I retract what I stated a while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by adding the words, "or any cocaine or derivative thereof," so that this amendment shall be the same as the one adopted yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the amendment, "or any cocaine or any derivative thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the amendments, line 13, page 18, the following:

"Provided, That not exceeding six-sevenths of the amount ascertained pursuant to the weighing of the mail on any route in the year 1905 or in the year 1906 as the annual pay on such route for transporting the mail shall be paid out of the moneys hereby appropriated until such ascertainment shall have been readjusted in accordance with order of Postmaster-General Meyer, No. 412, or until it shall have been finally determined by law that the first-recited ascertainments are binding upon the Government for the ensuing fiscal year, notwithstanding any error or wrong in the basis of such ascertainments."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I submit that this is a question worthy the consideration of every Member of this House. On March 3 the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] said, in the course of a very able and elaborate address in this Chamber:

I am leading up to what I regard as an exceedingly serious question. If the present ruling of the Postmaster-General is correct, if Order 412 is a correct interpretation of the law, then this Government, the people of this Republic, have been robbed of seventy millions of dollars since 1880. If this statement of the ruling of the Postmaster-General is correct, then this Government has paid into the hands of the railroad companies $70,000,000 that belong to the people of the country. Now, why do I say that? All agree that the change in divisors cuts down the railway mail pay 9.65 per cent. For the purpose of computation call it 10 per cent. The railway mail pay in 1880 was, in round numbers, $10,000,000. In 1907 the railway mail pay was $44,660,000. Adding these together makes $54,660,000. Divide that by two and you have the average amount—and it is pretty nearly correct—$27,700,000, the amount that has been paid annually to the railway companies for carrying the mail. Now, following the latest interpretation of the law, 10 per cent of the $27,000,000 belongs to the people, and in every year during that time there has been paid to the railroad companies $2,700,000 which belongs to the people—the Government itself.

Let me add right here that under the computation submitted by the Post-Office Department to the Committee on the Post-Office the estimate of the differences in pay in the two unweighed sections of the country for the current year approximate $2,000,000, which, as I understand, is included and proposed to be appropriated for in this item. If I err, I trust the chairman of the committee will correct me.

The gentleman proceeded further:

Another remarkable thing in that connection. The Postmaster-General having found out, apparently, that the law was not properly interpreted, that the railroad companies had been receiving 10 per cent too much, this last order was made in June; but it was only made to apply to one of the four weighing sections of the United States.

Three of these weighing sections are not now under the provisions of that order. The Postmaster-General has placed himself in the anomalous position of admitting that the divisor was wrong, and is paying out of the Treasury in the current year over $3,000,000 without any warrant of law and in violation of the law as he construes it himself. Is it not a serious proposition? There is no way around it. If the Postmaster-General's order is right, then this money belongs to the people.

It certainly does appear to be anamolous that the Attorney-General of the United States should conclude by an exposition so luminous that none can fail to see the force of his proposition, and no one can apparently successfully contradict or impeach the logic of his conclusion of fact, that where 365,000 pounds of mail matter are carried by a route in an entire year——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WANGER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for fifteen minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WANGER. It means an average of 1,000 pounds per day, no matter how many days the mails were weighed, that being the conclusion of fact that he reached; that an error has crept into the practice of the Post-Office Department and excessive payments have been made—that there is no suggestion for the discontinuance of such payments or any part of them. The facts of the matter are, as I am informed by those in the Post-Office Department specially charged with the administration of the subject-matter involved, that the maximum rates of pay authorized by law are accorded to a great majority of the carrying roads of the country, and each of these routes receives the maximum legal pay where only the true average is ascertained. Nevertheless the fact is that by a false process of reaching the conclusion as to average weight carried per day, the rate can be raised in accordance with the manner of weighing, so as to give the advantage to a number of companies of seven-sixths of the maximum pay for carrying the mail. The gentleman was right in saying that that was an anomalous position, and while the legal argument of the Attorney-General, in my humble opinion, is unanswerable and his illustration setting out the right way of ascertaining the true daily average of mails carried is right in point and condemns the past practice of the Department, yet, whether it was a desire to avoid a conclusion attributing error to another and fellow-Cabinet officer, or for some other reason equally creditable to his heart, he finally concludes that whether the Postmaster-General shall adopt one method of ascertainment, which gives the maximum rate of pay, or whether he will adopt another method whereby the daily average it produces will give seven-sixths of the maximum pay authorized by law for performing the service, that it is within the discretion of the Postmaster-General to adopt one or the other method.

It may seem ungracious for me to presume to question the conclusions of the Attorney-General of the United States, and I have no controversy with him as to his reasoning respecting the law involved, and for a clear recital of the subject and of his treatment of it I here insert his opinion:

OPINION OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL IN THE MATTER OF COMPENSATION OF RAILROAD COMPANIES FOR CARRYING THE MAILS, ETC.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, September 27, 1907.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your request for an opinion as to the legality of order No. 412 of your Department, issued June 7, 1907, and of order No. 165, for which it was a substitute. I learn from you that these orders are as follows:

Order No. 165, dated March 2, 1907:

"That when the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes, the whole number of days the mails are weighed shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day."

Order No. 412, dated June 7, 1907:

"When the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes, the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day."

The statutes which appear to bear directly on the subject are the following:

Section 4002 of the Revised Statutes (from the act of March 3, 1873, 17 Stat., 558):

"SEC. 4002. The Postmaster-General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation hereafter to be paid for the transportation of mails on railroad routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned.

"First. That the mails shall be conveyed with due frequency and speed and that sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed shall be provided for route agents to accompany and distribute the mails.

"Second. That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of 200 pounds, $50; 500 pounds, $75; 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,500 pounds, $125; 2,000 pounds, $150; 3,500 pounds, $175; 5,000 pounds, $200; and $25 additional for every additional 2,000 pounds, the average weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, at such times, after June 30, 1873, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct."

Post-office appropriation act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat., 341), following an appropriation for inland mail transportation by railroad:

"* * * And out of the appropriation for inland mail transportation the Postmaster-General is authorized hereafter to pay the expenses of taking the weights of mails on railroad routes, as provided by the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1874,' approved March 3, 1873; and he is hereby directed to have the mails weighed as often as now provided by law by the employees of the Post-Office Department and have the weights stated and verified to him by said employees under such instructions as he may consider just to the Post-Office Department and the railroad companies."

Post-office appropriation act of March 3, 1905 (33 Stat., 1088), following an appropriation for inland mail transportation by railroad:

"Provided, That hereafter before making the readjustment of pay for transportation of mails on railroad routes the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than ninety, at such times after June 30, 1905, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct."

The acts of July 12, 1876 (19 Stat., 79), June 17, 1878 (20 Stat., 142), and March 2, 1907 (35 Stat., 1205–1212), make certain changes in the rates of compensation, but none in the method of ascertaining the average daily weight of mail transported.

Were this question res integra, I should not consider it one of much difficulty. United States Revised Statutes 4002 fixes a rate of yearly pay per mile of track used to transport the mails, determined by the "average weight of mails per day" carried the entire length of the route. I see no escape from the conclusion that this means the average weight per day during a year; so that if on a particular route there were thus carried on one day 365,000 pounds and on the remaining 364 days nothing at all, the "average weight of mails per day" on which the annual compensation should be calculated would be 1,000 pounds. If, therefore, it had been deemed practicable or advisable to weigh all the mails transported by rail every day of the year, there could have been, to my mind, no doubt as to how the "average weight per day" would be determined, whether the mails were so carried on 365 days or on 313 or on 156 or on 12 or, as above suggested, on 1 day, their aggregate weight would have been added up and divided in all cases alike by 365.

It is, however, often impracticable without unreasonable labor to ascertain a strictly accurate average, and in such cases a conventional average is frequently established by law, agreement, or custom which is nearly enough right for all practical purposes and can be ascertained with vastly less trouble. A familiar example of this practice is the calculation of interest on a current bank balance. For this to be absolutely correct the balances due on every day of the year would have to be determined, added up, and divided by the whole number of days, i. e., 365, which, in the case of, say, a savings bank with many thousands of small accounts might involve an expense altogether disproportionate to the amount of the interest. It is therefore customary to ascertain the balances on a comparatively small number of days, often twelve, throughout the year, average these, and assume the result to be the average annual balance for the purpose of calculating interest.

It seems to have been, or to have been thought, unreasonably burdensome to require the mails to be weighed every day of the year, and the Congress, by the acts of March 3, 1873, and March 3, 1905, above noted, prescribed conventional methods of ascertaining the average weight. The methods are thus stated:

Act of March 3, 1873:

"* * * The average weight to be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, at such times, after June 30, 1873, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct."

Act of March 3, 1905:

"* * * The average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than ninety, at such times after June 30, 1905, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct."

It will be noted that these two acts say nothing about "divisors," and indeed do not profess to deal with the method of computation at all. How, from the statement of weights, he should obtain the result sought—that is to say, the daily average for a year on which the compensation was to be based—was a matter left to the discretion of the Postmaster-General. The Congress said to him only: "You need not cause the mails to be weighed every day of the year to ascertain the average weight per day during the year. You may, if you so choose" (for, it is to be observed, the law is permissive merely; the Postmaster-General, if he has money enough, may order the mails to be weighed for three hundred and sixty-five days). "You may, if you choose, weigh the mails only thirty (now ninety) days of each year, and only once in four years; but if you do this, the days selected must be working days and must be successive."

It is important to determine the meaning of the words lastly above italicized. It is said that "working days" has been consistently interpreted by the practice of your Department to mean "week days."

I do not think this statement can be sustained, for I am informed by you that prior to the act of 1905 the practice had been to weigh the mails on thirty-five consecutive days, thus including five Sundays. Now, I think, the law is on one point, at all events, perfectly clear: The mails are to be weighed on "working days" and on "working days" only; the use of the word "successive," instead of "consecutive," or some term of similar import, harmonizes exactly with this literal and, to my mind, unavoidable interpretation of the remaining words used. If, therefore, "working days" are to be read "week days," the practice of your Department, in thus weighing the mails on five Sundays, has been altogether illegal. If, however, the meaning of "working days" be "days on which mails are carried," the practice, to this extent, has been legal and in accord with what I believe to be the true intent of the law. As the practice of any of the great Executive Departments must always be assumed, so far as such assumption be possible, to rest upon a consistent and tenable view of the law, it is, I think, fair to say that the practice of the Post-Office Department, as contradistinguished from the language sometimes used by prominent officials in the course of the prolonged discussion of questions connected with this subject-matter, sustains the view that the words "working days" mean "days on which the carrier does work for the Post-Office," and not "week days;" and this I regard as clearly the true interpretation of the law.

It would seem, however, that an error has crept into the practice of your Department, as hereinafter stated, in the method of dealing with the information furnished through weighing the mails for at least thirty, now ninety, working days. As above noted, the obvious purpose of this provision is to relieve the Postmaster-General from the necessity of weighing the mails for every working day of the year. It does not prohibit him from weighing the mails throughout the year; nor does it require that the number of working days on which the mails are weighed shall be the same in the case of every carrier, although in none may they be less than thirty, now ninety, or other than "successive." Moreover, it in no wise changes the purpose of the inquiry, which, as above explained, has always been to ascertain a fair average per day during a year; not, of course, a fair average per day during seven or thirty or thirty-five or ninety or one hundred and five days, or any other fraction of a year. Having obtained from the results of the weighing such information as it can furnish as to the fair average weight for a "working day," it is left to the Postmaster-General to so deal with this information as to determine from it by appropriate calculations what would be a fair daily average for the ends of the law, i. e., as a basis for an annual compensation. It is obvious that from the mere weighing (which is all the law prescribes), standing alone, nothing would be determined as to the average. The Postmaster-General must therefore do something not mentioned in the statute to ascertain this, and although this matter is left to your discretion, and you are, of course, in no wise bound by any views expressed in this opinion regarding it, I think it may conduce to clearness if I here indicate what form of calculation appears to me best adapted to attain the ends of the law. We may suppose three railroads, of which one serves the mails seven, one six, and one three days in each week, and that the aggregate results of the weighing, divided by the number of days on which, in each case, the mails have been weighed, shows in each a daily average per working day of 1,000 pounds. In determining for each the fair average per day during a year, no change is needed in the figures for the first; those for the second should be reduced by one-seventh, and those for the third by four-sevenths; so that the first would be 1,000 pounds, the second 857.14 pounds, the third 428.57 pounds.

I have said that I should consider the question involved in your request one of no great difficulty were it a new one. Such, however, is not the case.

Prior to the issuance of Order No. 165 on March 2, 1907, the uniform practice of the Post-Office Department, except for a short period in 1884, as hereinafter stated, in determining the average daily weight of mail transported on railroad routes, appears to have been to have such mail weighed for a period covering not less than thirty successive working days (which term had been alleged to mean thirty successive week days, and therefore made such weighing period cover at least five weeks, or thirty-five days), and in every case, whether the mail was carried and weighed three, six, or seven days of the week, to divide the total weight thus ascertained by the number of working or week days in such period—that is to say, thirty. Thus in the case of a route on which the mail was carried three days of the week the weight was taken on such days for five weeks and the aggregate of the fifteen weighings divided by thirty to obtain the daily average. The same process was followed for thirty or thirty-five weighings, respectively, in the cases of routes on which the mail was carried six and seven days of the week. The average obtained was described as a "working" or "week" day average and not considered a daily average; but with regard to Sunday carrying roads it was evidently neither.

This practice, it appears, grew out of an effort to compensate the Sunday carrying roads for facilitating the transmission of the mails. It was thought that if the weight of mails carried on Sundays had been omitted in the case of such roads they would not only have received no compensation for carrying the same, but would have suffered an actual loss by reason of their diligence because by delaying the same until Monday it was said that they could have had such mail weighed in on that day.

In a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to C. Jay French, superintendent railway mail service, fifth division, dated March 24, 1876, there are the following instructions:

"The mails are to be weighed for the given number of successive working days (thirty in the weighing to which these instructions particularly relate), and in case mails are carried on any route also on Sundays, returns of the weights of such Sunday mails are to be furnished in the same manner as the others, to be included in consolidating the returns for the period, the object being, as you are aware, to obtain a fair average of the service for the working year. On the other hand, if mails are conveyed less frequently than every working day, the period of the weighing is not to embrace more than the given number of working days, counting both those on which the mails are conveyed and those on which they are not, the object being the same as in the other case."

On September 18, 1884, Postmaster-General W. Q. Gresham issued order No. 44, as follows:

"That hereafter when the weight of mails is taken on railroad routes performing service seven days per week the whole number of days the mails are weighed, whether thirty or thirty-five, shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day."

Postmaster-General Gresham retired in October, 1884. Postmaster-General Frank Hatton, who succeeded him, submitted the question to the Attorney-General, his letter and the reply thereto being as follows:

OCTOBER 22, 1884.

SIR: The act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stat., p. 558), regulating the pay for carrying the mails on railroad routes, provides * * * "That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of 200 pounds, $50; 500 pounds, $75; 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,500 pounds, $125; 2,000 pounds, $150; 3,500 pounds, $175, etc. * * * ; the average weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty. * * *."

Upon a large number of the railroad routes mails are carried on six days each week—that is, no mails are carried on Sunday. On others they are carried on every day in the year.

It has been the practice since 1875, in arriving at the average weight of mails per day on these two classes of service, to treat the "successive working days" as being composed of the six working or secular days in the week, which is explained by the following illustrations:

Two routes, No. 1 and No. 2, over each of which 313 tons of mail are carried annually:

On route No. 1 mails are carried twice daily, except Sunday, six days per week, and are weighed for thirty successive working days—covering usually a period of thirty-five days. The result is divided by 30 and an average weight of mails per day of 2,000 pounds is obtained.

Transportation per mile of road per annum	miles	1,252
Weight per mile of road per annum	tons	313
Pay per ton per mile of road per annum	cents	37.92
Pay per mile run	do	11.9
Rate of pay allowed per mile per annum		$150

On route No. 2 mails are carried twice daily, seven days per week, and are weighed for thirty successive working days and for the intervening Sundays, the weight on the Sundays being treated as if carried on Mondays, the weighing, as before, covering usually a period of thirty-five days. The result is divided by 30 and an average weight of mails per day of 2,000 pounds is obtained.

Transportation per mile of road per annum	miles	1,460
Weight per mile of road per annum	tons	313
Pay per ton per mile of road per annum	cents	47.92
Pay per mile run	do	10.2
Rate of pay allowed per mile per anum		$150

I have thought it necessary to give the foregoing illustrations in order that the practice of this Department under the law cited may readily appear, and I will thank you to advise me whether that practice is in compliance with or in violation of the statute. If not in conformity with the law, will you please indicate the correct method by which the average weight per day should be obtained and the compensation adjusted thereon.

Very respectfully,

FRANK HATTON,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General, Department of Justice.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, October 31, 1884.

SIR: I have considered your communication of the 22d instant, requesting to know whether the construction placed by the Post-Office Department on section 4002, subordinate section 2, prescribing the mode in which the average of the weight of mails transported on railroad routes shall be ascertained is correct, and am of opinion that that construction is correct, and that a departure from it would defeat the intention of the law and cause no little embarrassment.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

S. F. PHILLIPS,
Acting Attorney-General.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

The above letter from the Acting Attorney-General is taken from Opinions of Attorney-General, Volume VIII, page 71. While it is there stated that it was signed by S. F. Phillips, the original, received at the Post-Office Department, is signed by William A. Maury.

Postmaster-General Gresham's order was revoked January 16, 1885. This order had evidently in view the same purpose as order No. 165.

We have here, then, a case where the practical interpretation placed upon the act of Congress of March 3, 1873, in regard to obtaining the daily average weight of mail upon railroad routes by the Post-Office Department has been, except for a few months, unbroken for thirty-five years, although its correctness was authoritatively challenged. It also appears that while Congress, in 1876 and 1878 and again in 1907, provided for a reduction in the maximum rates established by the act of March 3, 1873, it made no change in the provision as to obtaining the average weight. It further appears that in 1905 Congress reenacted that provision in exactly the same language, except that "ninety" was substituted for "thirty."

Moreover, it should be noted that the post-office appropriation bill (H. R. 25483) reported to the House on February 6, 1907, provided:

"The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1907, for the transportation of mails on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of upward of 5,000 pounds by making the following reductions from the present rates per mile per annum for the transportation of mails on such routes: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds, 5 per cent; 48,000 pounds and less than 80,000 pounds, 10 per cent, and $19 additional for every additional 2,000 pounds: Provided, That hereafter the average weight per day be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive days, not less than 105, at such times and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct: Provided further, That hereafter, at the time of the weighing of the mails at the periods required by law, empty mail bags shall not be weighed nor taken as any part of the total weight of mails in estimating the pay for transportation of said mails."

The accompanying report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and two minority reports discussed the question very fully and showed clearly the intention on the part of the committee, that, in the words of its report—

"In computing the average weight of mail carried per day, the whole number of days such mail may be weighed shall be used as the divisor."

On February 20, 1907, while the House in Committee of the Whole was considering the post-office bill, the following amendment was offered by Mr. MURDOCK to follow the provision "For inland transportation by railroad routes, $44,660,000:"

"Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended in payment for transportation of the mails by railroad routes where the average weight of mails per day has been computed by the use of a divisor less than the whole number of days such mails have been weighed."

A point of order was made against this amendment on the ground that it changed existing law. The Chair sustained the point, observing (41 Cong. Rec., 3471):

"The CHAIRMAN. The existing law has received a construction by the officers charged with the duty of administering it, and that construction the Chair feels bound to follow. The proposed amendment changes existing law as construed by the proper officer, by changing the divisor. This is in the guise of a limitation; but it has been held over and over again here that a limitation is negative in its nature and may not include positive enactment establishing rules for executive officers. It has been held further that while limitation may provide that a part of an appropriation shall not be used except in a certain way, yet the restriction of executive discretion may not go to the extent of an imposition of new duties. And the limitation on the discretion exercised under the law by a bureau of the Government is a change of existing law. The decisions on the question of limitation, the attempt to draw a well-defined distinction between changes of existing law and a proper limitation, are among the most difficult questions that the Chair is ever called upon to decide."

Upon appeal from the decision of the Chair its ruling was sustained. (Id., 3472.)

Later on the same day the provision of the bill above quoted directing the Postmaster-General to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after July 1, 1907, for the transportation of the mails on railroad routes, which included the proviso "That hereafter the average weight per day be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive days," etc. (the word "working" being omitted), also went out upon a point of order (41 Cong. Rec., 3473). Subsequently, on the same day, the rules were suspended, and this provision, without the proviso as to obtaining the average, was inserted and became the law. (Id., 3494.)

The principles of law bearing upon the solution of the matter under consideration in this aspect are settled by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

It has been held that where the meaning of a statute is doubtful or ambiguous the practical construction placed upon it by the Department of the Government charged with its administration, if contemporaneous, uniform, and long continued, although not deemed controlling on the courts, is to be treated with respect and will ordinarily be followed. (Brown v. United States, 113 U. S., 568; United States v. Philbrick, 120 U. S., 52; Robertson v. Downing, 127 U. S., 607; United States v. Alabama R. R. Co., 142 U. S., 615.)

In the last-mentioned case, which involved the question of compensation to railroads for carrying the mails, the court said:

"* * * It is a settled doctrine of this court that, in case of ambiguity, the judicial department will lean in favor of a construction given to a statute by the Department charged with the execution of such statute, and, if such construction be acted upon for a number of years, will look with disfavor upon any sudden change whereby parties who have contracted with the Government upon the faith of such construction may be prejudiced."

But the true scope of this principle is illustrated by a considerable number of cases in which the court has refused to adopt the departmental construction of a statute. In these cases the court has said that such departmental construction is without weight where the statute is clear and explicit and free from ambiguity or doubt. (Swift Co. v. United States, 105 U. S., 691, 695; United States v. Graham, 110 U. S. 219, 221; United States v. Tanner, 147 U. S., 661, 663; United States v. Alger, 152 U. S., 384, 397; Studebaker v. Perry, 184 U. S., 258, 268–269.)

In Swift Co. v. United States, the court says:

"There is no serious question raised as to the proper construction of the internal-revenue acts upon the point, it being virtually admitted that the contention on the part of the appellant upon the provisions of the statutes is correct.

"It is met, however, in the opinion of the Court of Claims, and in argument on behalf of the Government here, that the contrary construction, to pay these commissions in stamps at their face value, has been acted upon by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from the beginning, has been acquiesced in by purchasers and dealers, and has never been changed by Congress; and as an official practice has thus acquired the force of law, or if not, then, at least, it was a course of dealing, well known to the appellant, and acquiesced in, by which it accepted stamps at their face value in payment of its commissions, which it is not at liberty now to open, question, and reverse.

"The right construction of the internal-revenue acts upon the point of the allowance of commissions to dealers in proprietary articles, purchasing stamps made from their own dies, and for their own use, is too clear to bring the case within the first alternative. The rule which gives determining weight to contemporaneous construction, put upon a statute, by those charged with its execution, applies only in cases of ambiguity and doubt. (Edward's Lessee v. Darby, 12 Wheat., 206; Smythe v. Fiske, 23 Wall., 374; United States v. Moore, 95 U. S., 760; United States v. Pugh, 99 id., 265.)"

In United States v. Alger, the court says:

"If the meaning of that act were doubtful its practical construction by the Navy Department would be entitled to great weight. But as the meaning of the statute as applied to these cases appears to this court to be perfectly clear, no practice inconsistent with that meaning can have any effect. (Swift Co. v. United States, 105 U. S., 691, 695; United States v. Graham, 110 U. S., 619; United States v. Tanner, 147 U. S., 661.)"

In so far as this question is affected by the practice of the Post-Office Department standing alone, I think it comes fully within the principle laid down in the two cases lastly above cited. The law says the average weight shall be ascertained "by the actual weighing of the mails for * * * successive working days." The practice has been to weigh on Sundays, and yet when the average is to be ascertained Sundays are excluded from the divisor. This practice is not only clearly erroneous, but logically indefensible. If Sundays are not "working days," the law does not permit the mails to be weighed on Sundays; if they are "working days," their exclusion from the divisor renders the result of the computation false on its face. It may be conceded that the question whether "working day" is to be interpreted "week day" in this provision of the statute is not free from doubt, and if the practice of the Post-Office Department were consistent with one construction and inconsistent with the other, there might be room to apply the doctrine of Brown's and Philbrick's cases; but as it is consistent with neither, and can be defended, if at all, only by reading the words in one sense for one purpose and in another sense for another purpose there is no room for the application of any such doctrine.

The practice seems to have constituted, in fact, a sort of administrative legislation, intended to encourage the carrying of the mails on Sundays, and the most serious difficulty connected with the subject is to determine whether there has not been a legislative sanction of the practice by the Congress in its failure to change the method of computation when it reenacted the statute in 1905, for there can be no question that the practice of the Department in this respect was, or might have been, well known to the Congress, by reason of very full statements concerning it in public documents.

In Dollar Savings Bank v. United States, 19 Wall., 227, the court refused to hold that the Congress, by the reenactment of a statute, had adopted the construction placed upon it by the Department of the Government charged with its administration. The statute under consideration in that case (act of Congress of July 13, 1866, 14 Stat., 138) provided:

"That there shall be levied and collected a tax of 5 per cent on all dividends in scrip or money thereafter declared due, wherever and whenever the same shall be payable, to stockholders, policy holders, or depositors, or parties whatsoever, including nonresidents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, income, or gains of any bank, trust company, savings institution, and of any fire, marine, life, inland insurance company, either stock or mutual, under whatever name or style known or called, in the United States or Territories, whether specially incorporated or existing under general laws, and on all undistributed sums, or sums made or added during the year to their surplus or contingent funds; and said banks, trust companies, savings institutions, and insurance companies shall pay the said tax, and are hereby authorized to deduct and withhold from all payments made on account of any dividends or sums of money that may be due and payable as aforesaid the said tax of 5 per cent: * * * Provided, That the tax upon the dividends of life insurance companies shall not be deemed due until such dividends are payable; nor shall the portion of premiums returned by mutual life insurance companies to their policy holders, nor the annual or semiannual interest allowed or paid to the depositors in savings banks or savings institutions, be considered as dividends."

It was contended that savings institutions were relieved from taxation by the proviso to this section; but the court held otherwise, and in reply to the argument based upon the practical construction placed upon the act, said (pp. 236–237):

"Our attention has been called to the fact that in 1867 and again in 1870 the Commissioners of Internal Revenue construed the proviso as exempting savings institutions from the tax upon all sums added to their surplus or contingent funds, and that the act of Congress of July 14, 1870, which reduced internal taxation, employed substantially the same language respecting savings banks as that contained in the act of 1866. In view of this, the plaintiffs in error argue that Congress required the Commissioner to prescribe what returns savings banks should make; that this made it his duty to put a construction on the law; that he did so, and held that such institutions were not required to return undistributed earnings carried to a surplus fund, and that after this practical construction had been made and acted upon more than three years Congress reenacted the tax, reduced in amount, in the same words. Hence, it is inferred the construction given by the Commissioner was adopted. It is, doubtless, a rule that when a judicial construction has been given to a statute the reenactment of the statute is generally held to be in effect a legislative adoption of that construction. This, however, can only be when the statute is capable of the construction given to it, and when that construction has become a settled rule of conduct. The rule, we think, is inapplicable to this case. In the first place, the decisions of the Internal Revenue Commissioner can hardly be denominated judicial constructions. That officer was not required by the law to prescribe what returns savings banks were required to make. That was prescribed by the act of Congress itself, and he had no power to dispense with the requisition. There is therefore no presumption that his decisions were brought to the knowledge of Congress when the act of 1870 was passed. And again, the construction he gave is an impossible one, for, as we have seen, it makes the proviso plainly repugnant to the body of the section.

"We are constrained, then, to hold that the act of Congress does impose upon the plaintiffs in error the tax, to recover which the present suit was brought."

This opinion would probably be decisive of the present question were it not for some more recent decisions of the court. In New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission (200 U. S., 361, 399) it was contended that the prohibition of the act to regulate commerce and its amendments against undue preferences and discriminations ought not to be interpreted as applying against a carrier who was a dealer in commodities "because of an administrative construction long since given to the act by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the body primarily charged with its enforcement, and which has become a rule of property affecting vast interests which should not be judicially departed from, especially as such construction; it is asserted, has been impliedly sanctioned by Congress by frequently amending the act without changing it in this particular." The court said on this point (p. 401):

"* * * A construction made by the body charged with the enforcement of a statute, which construction has long obtained in practical execution, and has been impliedly sanctioned by the reenactment of the statute without alteration in the particulars constructed, when not plainly erroneous, must be treated as read into the statute. Especially do we think this rule applicable to the case in hand, because of the nature and extent of the authority conferred on the Commission from the beginning concerning the prohibitions of the act as to rebates, favoritism, and discrimination of all kinds, and particularly in view of the repeated declarations of the court that an exertion of power by the Commission concerning such matters was entitled to great weight and was not lightly to be interfered with."

These remarks were, strictly speaking, obiter dicta, for the court said immediately afterwards:

"The concessions thus made, however, are wholly irrelevant to the case before us."

In the case of United States v. Falk & Bro. (204 U. S., 143), however, the court seems to have come very near qualifying the decision in Dollar Savings Bank v. United States, above cited. In that case the Government contended that the practical construction given by the Executive Department to a proviso in the tariff act of 1890 should control the interpretation of a similar proviso in the tariff act of 1897, and the court sustained that view, saying (p. 152):

"This, then, is our view: The Attorney-General having construed the proviso of section 50 of the act of 1890 as not restricted to the matter which immediately preceded it, but as of general application, and this construction having been followed by the executive officers charged with the administration of the law, Congress adopted the construction by the enactment of section 33 of the act of 1897, and intended to make no other change than to require as the basis of duty the weight of the merchandise at the time of entry instead of its weight at the time of its withdrawal from warehouse."

This aspect of the question has caused me some measure of doubt, but, upon careful consideration, I do not think it falls within the principle of the case last cited. The construction supposed to have been placed upon the statute in the practice of the Post-Office Department is not only "plainly erroneous," like the case suggested as an exception by the court in 200 United States, but is "an impossible one," as was that rejected by the court in 19 Wall. There is nothing to show that the construction by the Attorney-General sustained in the Falk case seemed to the court either "plainly erroneous," or "impossible." It must be furthermore remembered that in reenacting the statute in 1905, as in enacting it in 1873, the Congress only fixed a minimum to the number of days on which the Postmaster-General must have the mails weighed; he remained, as he had been previously, entirely at liberty to increase their number in his discretion, and he might therefore, as above noted, have made the weighing period extend through the entire year, or have supplemented the weighing by computations which would render practically nugatory the construction supposed to be involved in the practice. In other words, in 1905 the Congress may have felt justified in awaiting an administrative remedy for a faulty administrative practice and have only thought seriously of a legislative remedy two years later. The opinion purporting to have been given by Solicitor-General Phillips on October 31, 1884, is not only, as above stated, irregular in form, but so meager and inadequate in its statement and discussion of the questions involved that I can not recognize it as binding upon me in the premises. As to the decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, sustained upon appeal, to the effect that the proposed amendment requiring a divisor "not less than the whole number of days such mails have been weighed," made a change in existing law, I am not aware of any precedent holding such a decision to be binding upon this Department. The decision may be held, moreover, to have been correct without regard to the "construction" alleged by the Chairman to have been placed upon the law by "the proper officer."

It follows from what I have said that I consider the form or method in which the information obtained from weighing the mails in accordance with the act of March 3, 1905, shall be utilized a matter in your discretion, provided your action shall be directed to the ascertainment of what, according to your best judgment, would be an average weight as nearly true as may be practicable per day during a year of the mails carried as the statute lastly aforesaid directs, to be used as a basis for a yearly compensation to the carrier; of course the adequacy of such compensation is for the Congress, not for the Postmaster-General. Each of the two orders first above mentioned constituted, therefore, in strictness, a legal exercise of a discretion vested by law in the Postmaster-General. If, however, no further calculation is to be made beyond the addition of ascertained weights and division by the divisor selected, it seems obvious that Order No. 165 may lead to arbitrary and inequitable results. Order No. 412, upon the same assumption, will give, as the average weight per day during a year, the said average weight per day during somewhat more than one-fourth of a year; and there is no reason to suppose its results will be unjust or have any greater inaccuracy than is authorized and contemplated by the act of 1905.

Yours, respectfully, CHARLES J. BONAPARTE,
Attorney-General.

Mr. WANGER. My complaint of the words of the Attorney-General is confined to the sentence in the last paragraph, "Each of the two orders first above mentioned constituted, therefore, in strictness, a legal exercise of a discretion vested by law in the Postmaster-General." I can not complain of the words in the beginning of the paragraph, because they are coupled with the sound proviso—touching the method of utilizing information—that the action of the Postmaster-General must be directed to what, in his best judgment, "would be an average weight as nearly true as may be practicable per day during a year of the mails carried as the statute lastly aforesaid directs, to be used as a basis for a yearly compensation to the carrier;" but I am unable to reconcile myself to any process of reasoning which will lodge in an administrative officer authority to grant more than the maximum rate of compensation provided by law; and the vice of Order No. 44 of Postmaster-General Gresham and of Order No. 165 of Postmaster-General Cortelyou was that while they provided for a correct ascertainment of the average weight where the mails were carried on every one of the 35 or 105 days of the weighing period, they granted seven-sixths of the maximum pay for the service on routes to a company which only performed service six days in the week, giving a preference to those who rendered the least service to the Government, and an excess of legal compensation.

Let us consider the practical effect of the method of ascertainment of average weight under Orders 44 and 165, using the illustration of the Attorney-General that a total weight of 365,000 pounds carried over a route in a year means an average of 1,000 pounds per day in that year, no matter on how many or on how few days the mails are actually carried. Where the carrying is done in seven days of each week and the weighings are on each day you get the correct 1,000 pounds average, and the railway carrier is paid the maximum compensation. How can any carrier earn any more than that legal compensation for that service by any legerdemain of mathematics?

According to the practice of the Department, worked out under Orders 44 and 165, if the mails are only carried six days in the week you divide the 365,000 pounds by 313 and get an average of 1,166 pounds per day for each working day in the year, and in the latter instance pay the carrier upon the basis of 365 times 1,166, or for carrying 425,590 pounds in the year. This pay is for 365,000 pounds of mails carried, and for 60,590 pounds having no existence except in the basis of compensation, but for which just as good money is paid as if those 60,590 pounds had been mail matter.

If those orders, 44 and 165, had contained the further provision that where mails are only carried six days in the week, the average per day for the year should be found by taking only six-sevenths of the average for the weighing period, they would have been unexceptionable except as being less simple and clear than Order No. 412.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WANGER. Certainly; right here and now.

Mr. MURDOCK. There was so much confusion here when the Clerk read that amendment that I would like you to tell the House what your amendment proposes to do. In that amendment do you propose to make it apply to all the four sections, or to go back to the four sections in the quarterennial way?
